I believe that in any great organization, such as the Postal Service, the best results and the highest efficiency can only be achieved through the whole-hearted cooperation of a contented and loyal force of employees.

Let me again call your attention to the amendment on page 14 of the bill, which provides that hereafter there shall be no distinction in salary between letter carriers assigned to collection duty and to carriers assigned to delivery duty. The amendment further provides that those letter carriers who have already been reduced because of the department's order that letter carriers assigned to collection duty should not receive more than $1,000 per annum shall be restored to their former grade.

This amendment was adopted by the committee at my suggestion, and its purpose is to undo the harm that has been done to many faithful old letter carriers throughout the country, who, after serving the Government faithfully for many years, were suddenly reduced in compensation from twelve hundred dollars per annum to $1,000 per annum. This reduction came to these employees as a very severe blow.

In this amendment the committee aimed to definitely place the construction of Congress on the salary classification act of March 2, 1907. This act applies to post-office clerks and to letter carriers employed in the City Delivery Service. This act provides for their promotion from grade to grade on the basis of their service in each grade. This act did not provide that any distinction should be made as between letter carriers employed in either the collection or delivery of mail matter, and the committee did not believe that the department, by its interpretation, should read into the act of March 2, 1907, something that it did not contain.

The committee has also incorporated in this bill an amendment to provide for the promotion of 5 per cent of the clerks from the twelve-hundred-dollar grade to the thirteen-hundred-dollar grade and for the promotion of 5 per cent of the clerks in the thirteen-hundred-dollar grade to the fourteen-hundred-dollar grade. When the salary law of 1907 was adopted, Congress created the designation of "special clerk" at thirteen hundred and fourteen hundred dollars per annum. This designation of "special clerk" was created as a blanket designation to cover certain classes of clerks who, under the old salary law of 1889, were authorized to receive as much as fourteen hundred dollars per annum.

However, when Congress created the designation of "special clerk" it did not provide any means of promoting the deserving clerks to these higher grades. This amendment specifically provides for this promotion and provides a definite method of promotion. This amendment also provides that 5 per cent of the clerks at second-class post offices who now receive eleven hundred dollars per annum shall be promoted to twelve hundred dollars per annum. Although Congress provided a twelve-hundred-dollar grade for clerks in both first and second class offices, no provision has ever been made until now to promote these clerks in second-class offices above the eleven-hundred-dollar grade.

I am sure that the efficiency of the men will be improved, because it will now be possible to reward them for their zeal in discharging their duties.

Our committee adopted another amendment providing that clerks in first and second class post offices and letter carriers in City Delivery Service shall be allowed compensatory time off duty for all necessary work performed on the recognized holidays. Because of the nature of their employment it is necessary for many of these employees to be on duty not only on holidays but on Sundays as well. In 1912 Congress adopted legislation providing that these employees should be given compensatory time off duty for all Sunday work performed, and it is only a matter of elemental justice that they should also have compensatory time off duty for the work performed on holidays.

Another amendment of much importance to the clerks and carriers is one that provides that substitute post-office clerks and substitute letter carriers shall be paid at the rate of 35 cents per hour when performing auxiliary service or temporary service however designated. This amendment is incorporated in the bill to cure an evil that has become widespread because of the practice of temporarily appointing these substitutes for indefinite periods at the annual rate of $800 per annum, which is the lowest grade of compensation provided by law for regularly appointed clerks and carriers. This rate of $800 per annum on an hourly basis amounts to but 27½ cents per hour. The injustice of compelling substitutes to work at this low rate, through the medium of this subterfuge, whereas Congress had enacted legislation to give them 35 cents an hour, is so apparent that it needs no extended comment.

The committee also voted to extend the so-called Reilly Compensation Act, which provides for the compensation of certain employees who have been injured in the discharge of their duties in the Postal Service and for the further compensation of their legal heirs in case of death resulting from such injuries, so as to apply to all other classified civil-service employees in the Postal Service not heretofore covered.

I was particularly pleased with the action of the committee in agreeing to my amendment that certain of the printers employed in a few of the very largest post offices which maintained printing offices shall hereafter receive $1,500 per annum, thus permitting them to enjoy the same wage scale paid to their fellow craftsmen by private establishments operating in the same community.

The Post Office Committee voted to abolish the $720 grade for laborers engaged in the Postal Service, thereby establishing a flat rate of $840 per annum. The committee was unanimous in recognizing the fact that $720 per annum was not a sufficient compensation upon which the Government could expect these employees to support themselves and families.

Mr. Chairman, later on in the session I hope that the Post Office Committee will consider legislation to provide for the establishment of an impartial "trial board," whose duty it shall be to sit in judgment in the cases of all postal employees against whom charges may be filed which might involve either the removal of the employee or his reduction in rank or compensation. Under existing conditions there is too much arbitrary authority vested in the supervisory offices. Now the accused employee can not secure fair treatment. Under the present system the proceeding is all one sided. The employee does not even have access to all of the charges in the case against him, which are sometimes secretly filed. The good of the public service, as well as the protection of the rights of the employee, demand the enactment of legislation for the establishment of a "trial board," which is merely putting into effect the American doctrine of a fair trial.

Another great and disturbing problem is the matter of night work in post offices. Because of the nature of the business, many letter carriers and the vast majority of the clerks in post offices are compelled to labor at night. It is time that something should be done to relieve this army of night workers.

For many years this condition has been recognized as an unjust condition in the postal service of England.

In the English postal service seven hours of night work is recognized as the equal of eight hours of day work. In the English postal service the difficulty of working at night is further recognized by providing for the payment of time and a quarter for all labor performed in excess of regular schedule.

Here in the Government Printing Office in Washington the exacting and unhealthful nature of night work is recognized, and the night workers in this establishment are employed on the basis of a considerable less number of hours than are the day workers.

In addition to the discouraging amount of night work which is imposed upon post-office clerks, they are also compelled to devote many hours of their precious leisure time, so badly needed for their recuperation, in the study of difficult schemes of mail distribution. In fact, the post-office clerk is never free from study from the time he enters the service until he leaves it. For all these hours and hours which the clerk puts in at home in the study necessary to be expert in the distribution of the mails he gets no consideration from the Government whatever, either in additional compensation or in time allowance for this study.

The Congress enacted a law providing that post-office clerks shall not work more than eight hours per day, and that when obliged to do so they shall be compensated extra therefor. Surely these hours and hours of study which these clerks put in at home after their regular tour is work of the most exhausting character, and these professional post-office men, the expert distributors, should receive compensation for these hours of study, either in cash or by way of a time allowance sufficient to enable them to maintain themselves at the point of efficiency demanded of them. To memorize a scheme of distribution consisting of three or four thousand post offices, to know the various railroad trains which are to carry the mail to the post offices at different hours of the day and night, and to store away in their memory the changes that are taking place from day to day is a tremendous task.

The tendency of the department is to exact still further perfection from these distributors; in fact, this tendency is now being carried to an extreme that seems wholly unnecessary.

Mr. Chairman, it is well that we should know of these conditions of employment which surround these faithful servants who are responsible for the wonderful efficiency of the Postal Service, upon which depends the whole fabric of the business and social life of the Nation.

These employees are as much a resource of the people as any other element that can be named, and I believe it should be our policy to conserve our resources. Conservation is the theme of the hour.

After studying carefully the Post Office Department and its treatment of the men who compose the Postal System, I am led to ask this question:

Are the present Post Office Department officials above the law? It has been brought to my attention that in an address made by First Assistant Postmaster General Roper before a meeting of first and second class postmasters, held in Washington in October, 1915, in speaking of the policy of the Post Office Department made the statement that—

> If any postmaster has incurred ideas regarding the policy and purposes of the department and felt that he was not exactly in accord with the department, that he should get himself straightened out, and if he could not accustom his ideas to those of the department that it would be better for him and better for the service to tender his resignation.

This statement was made to a body of men who are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate to conduct the post offices in their respective cities and who are presumed at least to be familiar with the customs and conditions prevailing in their cities and should know how to conduct the Postal Service to the best advantage of the public.

I have also been informed that the First Assistant Postmaster General, in response to invitations mailed to him by the postal employees' associations, after lecturing them regarding their official duties took upon himself the responsibility of setting a standard for the postal employees to follow that he assumed without warrant of law. I submit as part of my remarks copies of the papers sent by Mr. Roper and read to these organizations:

MR. ROPER'S ADDRESS.

> Mr. President and fellow postmasters [applause], if I did not feel that I am one of you, struggling just as you are, with the same objective that you have, as intensely interested as you are in giving to your respective communities efficient postal service, I should not feel free to talk to you as I shall this morning in regard to some rather delicate and yet very imminent problems in our service. I assume that all of you gentlemen have come to this convention for the purpose of learning by discussing these problems to become the most efficient postmasters that have ever been known in the classes which you represent. [Applause.] I am enthusiastic over my postmasters. I try to enter into their spirit. I try to put myself in their shoes, and, imbued as I am with your high motive and objective, I am going to discuss plainly, freely, and frankly with you this morning some of the things which disturb you and which disturb me possibly more than you, because of the fact that you represent larger post offices, where the organization is more compact, making the service in your offices more carefully supervised than in some of the smaller offices of the country. If this be the case, then I am discussing these things with you as an advisory board or as a committee of the whole on the state of the union. If, however, the conditions which I shall discuss exist in your offices, the discussion will be for the purpose of helping you and the department to bring the service at your offices to the condition that you desire and your people demand. [Applause.] I regard you as the postmasters that are keeping the post offices on the map, because you are doing more than 80 per cent of the postal business of this country. I was interested some time ago in a little story that will illustrate what I am trying to say. A church revivalist got off the train at a town where he had been scheduled to hold revival services. I will state that was a Methodist church, as that is my church [applause], and not having before visited the community he said to a newspaper boy: "Johnny, would you please show me the way to the post office, as I wish to mail a letter promptly to my wife?" The lad responded: "Yes, sir; I can show you the way to the post office." He carried the preacher down two or three blocks, and, pointing out a distant building, said: "There is the post office; everybody here knows where the post office is." Then the preacher put his hand into his pocket and drew out a coin and, handing it to Johnny, said: "Here's a dime I give you, Johnny, for your trouble in showing me the way to the post office. Take a nickel of this and come to the Methodist Church to-night and I will show you the way to heaven." "Oh, mister," said Johnny, "you can't do that." "Yes," replied the minister, "that is my business, showing people the way to heaven." "Why, mister, you don't know the way to the post office." Now, I regard postmasters as the individuals who are showing the people in this country the way to the post office, and by that I mean the best use, the proper use, of the post-office facilities.

Before I begin my discussion I wish to say that any postmasters who have not attended to their leave of absence and who would like to do so at this time will have an opportunity to hand in such requests when you visit the department to-morrow according to a schedule which I shall outline in a letter which will reach you this afternoon. Those who have already filed their leave requests, either by mail or since they have been here, will not repeat them. The Postmaster General wants to see you postmasters and have the opportunity and pleasure of shaking the hand of everyone here. The schedule that will be outlined in my letter will provide for your reception by groups of States at hour intervals, so as to give you opportunity to visit the Postmaster General, visit the auditor's office, and transact any business which you may wish to bring personally to the attention of the department.

SOME THINGS A POSTMASTER MAY DO TO INCREASE THE BUSINESS AND EFFECTIVENESS OF HIS OFFICE.

ACCOUNTS.

The most vital and important phase of a postmaster's service is his supervision of the financial and accounting work of his office. Strange to say, a large number of postmasters have been in this particular extraordinarily derelict. This situation can not be more forcibly brought to your attention than through the statement that irregularities in accounting have been directly responsible for the recommendations by post-office inspectors for the removal of about 500 postmasters during the fiscal year 1915. But few of these cases involved intentional embezzlement. In his own interest, as well as in the interest of the service, a postmaster must be peculiarly scrutinizing and vigilant in protecting public funds and in keeping a close personal check on all accounts.

Postmasters should not only see to it that inaccuracies do not creep into their accounts, but that these accounts are handled with the utmost promptness. All monthly, quarterly, and special reports to the auditor and the department should be forwarded without delay, if for no other reason than that to do so will avoid the expense of correspondence and delay in the work of the auditor. Indeed, some postmasters seem to await a request in every case and not infrequently two or three requests are necessary.

All postmasters in attendance on this convention should visit the Auditor for the Post Office Department and secure the benefit of the suggestions of that official. The improvements which he has inaugurated are designed to protect the postmasters as well as the Government through a clear analysis and settlement of accounts at the end of every quarter. Postmasters should render on the last day of the quarter a statement of credits and remittances in transit to balance the total amount of their debits, less the authorized reserve. This will save correspondence and keep their offices in good standing. It is an important feature of this new plan that every postmaster will receive a statement from the auditor at the close of each quarter showing the exact status of his account. While the auditor is an officer of the Treasury Department, the laws governing his work require him to make administrative examinations of postal accounts and hence contemplates the fullest cooperation on the part of postmasters.

The withdrawal of salaries by some postmasters at irregular intervals has been a prolific cause of irregularities in bookkeeping and shortages, which, unfortunately, have necessitated in some cases severe disciplinary action. A most salutary order has just been issued by the Postmaster General requiring postmasters of the presidential grade to withdraw their salaries only twice a month, namely, on the 15th and last day.

ALLOWANCES.

An unfortunate attitude has been manifested by some postmasters toward the department's efforts to keep the allowances for 1916 down to a point where they will not exceed the limited appropriations provided by Congress. The postmaster naturally represents his community, and it is an evidence of the right character and one that is respected by the department for an active and aggressive postmaster to seek for his office all that it is entitled to, but I hope that postmasters will appreciate that special favors will not be granted to anyone and that the entire effort of the department is to standardize its service and allowances and to keep within the appropriations granted by Congress. If a postmaster fails to receive all that he asks for, he has at least the consolation of knowing that he is being treated equitably with others. An illustration of what I am endeavoring to bring to your attention is found in a communication I received some time ago seriously objecting to a cut in the allowance requested by the postmaster for the quarter when the amount allowed was the same as used during the corresponding quarter last year. Now, the postmaster, of course, knew that the department is this year required to operate on exactly the same total amount of money as was allowed during the fiscal year 1915, but in spite of this he seemed to consider the department's action in reducing his allowance as unwarranted. He even went so far as to state that if he was not granted the increased allowance which he had requested he would sit back and let the responsibility for the service be borne solely by the department. It is hardly necessary to comment on this kind of attitude on the part of a postmaster. The quicker this postmaster's viewpoint is changed the better for the department and his patrons, even if to accomplish this it becomes necessary to separate him from the service.

Some postmasters seem to feel that when they do the least work possible to meet the demands of their offices they have performed their duty; that their chief concern is to impress their employees and the public with their own importance. Permit me to illustrate with this story: Some years ago a United States Senator happened to be passing the home town of another Senator. Near the railway station the visiting Senator saw a most beautiful horse. He walked up to the hostler and said, "What a magnificent horse! Do you own this horse?" Oh, no; it belongs to Senator Blank." "I suppose that is a draft horse; my, but he could pull tons." "No," the attendant said, "he would not pull anything." "Then he is a saddle nag; just look at his back. How wonderfully round and beautiful and symmetrical it is. A man would never know he was on a horse's back; he would think he was in a cradle." "No," the attendant said, "he would not carry the weight of your hat. No good for that." "Well, my dear man, of what earthly use is this horse?" "Oh, well," said the attendant, "he serves the same purpose in this community that his master does in the United States Senate. He sets the style." [Applause and laughter.] Now, we have no room for postmasters to set the style, and I do not believe that we have postmasters who want to confine themselves to sitting down and looking wise, or to getting fat by sitting. I believe we have put more postmasters on their feet during this administration than ever before. [Applause.] And by that I do not mean that we have done it by giving them salaries on which to subsist, but we have actually got them to walk and look after the business affairs of their offices.

Another instance of this kind was that of a postmaster who had received the usual letter from the department suggesting that, if feasible, he prepare, with the cooperation of interested patrons, a parcel-post exhibit for presentation at a local fair. In the letter of instructions to him it was distinctly stated that the department had no appropriation from which any expenses in connection with such exhibits could be defrayed. Notwithstanding this, the postmaster under review incurred a small amount of expense, for which he requested reimbursement from the department, stating at the same time that he had, through the means of the exhibit, saved the department a considerable sum of money. This, of course, the department appreciated, but seemed not to be able to explain to the postmaster that there was no appropriation out of which he could be reimbursed. Such an attitude on the part of a postmaster raises doubt as to his competency, for it should be a matter of common knowledge that the department can not expend money for purposes for which Congress has not appropriated it.

Such instances as these are in great contrast with the correct attitude manifested by a postmaster whose request for additional assistance had been curtailed by one-half. He wrote the department in these words: "While I regret that it was not possible to allow me all the additional clerks requested, every effort will be made to satisfactorily meet the needs of the service with the available help."

Postmasters must not infer from this that the department is not appreciative of the fact that business conditions are rapidly improving throughout the country and that they must be sustained in caring for this business. Were it feasible to locate and take up all slack in the service, it would not be an impossible undertaking to meet every demand which this increased business will bring during this fiscal year without appointing another clerk or carrier before July 1, 1916. Such a result is not practicable, and the department can only ask the postmasters to cooperate with it to the very best of their ability in placing the service on the highest basis of efficiency and business which the local conditions will permit. Your work with the department during the last fiscal year enabled the Bureau of the First Assistant to close the year with an unexpended balance of more than $5,000,000, and we feel that our reorganization work, when applied to the collection and delivery of mail to the same extent as it has been to the inside organization of post offices during the last two years, will easily enable the department to live within the appropriations of 1915. One of the miscellaneous outside endeavors of the postmaster should be to educate the public to a proper conception of the importance of fully addressing mail. The great loss to the department annually on account of improperly and insufficiently addressed mail has so impressed me as to prompt the recommendation, which I have just made to the Postmaster General, that Congress be requested to authorize the department to make a charge of 1 cent to be collected where directory service is given on account of the entire omission of the street address, and which is necessary to effect delivery.

DISCIPLINE.

The first requisite of efficient service is a loyal and satisfied working force, and it is the duty of postmasters to endeavor constantly to bring about and maintain this condition of their offices. The department holds the postmaster to a strict accountability for the satisfactory conduct of the laws and regulations affecting employees. The postmaster should assume a sympathetic and free attitude toward all employees and should establish a reputation for justice and impartiality in dealing with all matters of discipline. He should endeavor to see that meritorious service is suitably rewarded, and, on the other hand, that employees who create a weak place in the organization, on account of incompetency, bad habits, or insubordination, be adjusted to or separated from the service. Every employee in the post office should have access to the postmaster and be assured of a courteous and considerate hearing. No postmaster can become a successful disciplinarian unless he sees to it that a record of every employee is kept with great care, and that demerits are imposed impartially as required by the printed schedules furnished by the department. In case disciplinary action becomes necessary it is the grave responsibility of postmasters to see that the provisions of section 29 of the Postal Laws and Regulations are scrupulously complied with. Charges must be preferred to the clerk, carrier, or other employee concerned, in writing. He must be afforded an opportunity to submit his defense before the papers are forwarded to the department.

I am reminded of a story I have often told, and will ask you to pardon me for using it again. When I was at college one morning the president met me and said, "Young man, let me give you a thought for the day." The suggestion impressed me and I said, "Professor, give it to me." The professor replied, "Remember that a chain is no stronger than its weakest link, and that your character is made up by days which form the links of your character. Mind your actions to-day." After years of deliberation I have reached the conclusion that my professor did not state the whole truth involved. He might have said, "As related to human beings, especially as related to this association, and the Postal Service, by cooperation it is possible to make the chain as strong as its strongest link." [Applause.] That is the objective that you and I have as postal officials. Make it your object here to-day to counsel and advise with each other on these various problems, and with the officers of the department, so as to go away from here not with the thought of the weakest man in this convention, but with the thought of the strongest participants in this convention.

RELATIONS WITH THE PUBLIC.

The postmaster is the intermediary between the department and the people, and it is highly desirable that every postmaster should seek by every means at his command to bring about the closest cooperation, both between the department and his office and between his office and the patrons. The postmaster has an opportunity to perform service of great civic importance to his community and this opportunity should not be overlooked.

Postmasters are expected to assume a positive rather than a negative attitude toward the public, their constant aim being to adapt the facilities of their office to the requirements of the community and at the same time seek in every practicable way the cooperation of the patrons. Invaluable assistance may be obtained from chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and other civic organizations. By properly approaching these bodies postmasters may induce them to make a study of the postal situation and to bring to the attention of their members the desirability of cooperation with the post office. On proper representations from the postmaster many of these organizations will be found willing to charge some one of their committees with the duty of joining the postmaster in a campaign among the commercial and manufacturing houses for a more intelligent and effective use of mail facilities. This would include more careful addressing of mail, a primary assorting of mail into at least three classes (long, short, and packages), the facing of mail matter, the depositing of mail at the stations or the post office proper to obviate box collections and expedite dispatch, and to deposit their mail as early in the day as possible, and also to teach the public the full and correct use of the parcel-post facilities. The department is now working on a circular letter giving suggestions along these lines, which, it is hoped, may be of assistance to you in giving effectiveness to this suggestion. Local conditions, however, vary so much in different localities that real success along this line will depend upon the intelligent and constructive endeavors of the postmaster and his representatives in approaching and handling the public, and upon his zeal in following up such plans. We all must realize that his is a campaign of education which will require time and constant effort to bring to full fruition. It should be gratifying, however, that results are already being realized from the educational campaigns which have been made a feature of our service, especially during the last two years. An interesting and telling illustration of this is the fact that we are this year successfully administering the Postal Service and taking care of its expansion within the limitations of the appropriations of 1915. When you consider that the normal expansion of the service for a number of years has been from 6 to 8 per cent, it is easy to see that we are securing effective cooperation all along the line. This work, however, is only begun, and you postmasters have the opportunity of meeting even greater necessities.

The success of administrative officers, and especially of postmasters, is frequently in proportion to the patient attitude they manifest toward the public. The public should be made to feel that the postmaster is willing at all times to meet them, hear grievances, redress wrongs, and supply necessary postal facilities. There is a psychological element associated with complaints and grievances, and thus postmasters who manifest an open-minded cooperation are sure to have less trouble than those who have neither the disposition nor patience to permit the public, as well as the employees, to present their troubles, however trivial, and have them sympathetically considered. While the postmaster must respond to these demands, prompted by the public sentiment of their communities, they must not forget that they are the local representatives of the department and act in harmony with the department on those questions of larger importance fixed by general policies for the entire country. For instance, there is a disposition on the part of some postmasters to encourage local business committees to urge upon the department and to agitate publicly the erection of post-office buildings, and to secure for their postal districts special consideration and special privileges. Public buildings for post-office purposes have in the past been erected at many places where the needs of the Government do not warrant their construction, and widely varying limits of cost have been fixed for buildings, for which the needs are about the same. The Treasury Department, which has jurisdiction over the matter of public buildings, is constantly seeking to improve this condition, and the Postmaster General, who is deeply concerned in those buildings which are used for post-office purposes, has taken the position very decidedly that buildings should not be authorized primarily because of civic pride, but for economic and utilitarian reasons. It is only proper courtesy, therefore, for postmasters to have due regard for the attitude of the Postmaster General and to take no part by suggestion or otherwise in a campaign to secure the authorization for a site, or for a site and building, until they have ascertained whether the needs of their community, in the opinion of the department, justify the expenditure of public money for that purpose.

POSTMASTERS AS GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES.

In every community the postmaster is the representative of the Federal Government, and if he takes the broad view of the position which he should he will interest himself in many things which do not bear directly on the routine work of his office. The public will recognize that it is worth an effort on their part to curtail unnecessary mailing of franked and official matter, both on account of the expense to the Postal Service in transportation and handling and on account of the fact that the sending department or establishment is not aware that its mailings are failing to have the proper effect. Therefore, postmasters who are receiving large quantities of this kind of mail for distribution at their offices may well scrutinize the nature of the communications and by inquiry of their patrons determine whether a good purpose is being served by the full volume of these mailings, and, if not, they should make suitable suggestions to those in charge of the distribution of the franked or official mail in question.

The holding of parcel-post exhibits at State and county fairs, as suggested to postmasters in the past two years, is unquestionably conducive to a more extensive and intelligent use of the parcel-post facilities by the patrons of post offices. Similar efforts of this kind will occur to the minds of ingenious postmasters, and perhaps none is more effective than the practice of arranging with superintendents of schools for making addresses before different classes regarding the proper use of the mails. In this way the people can be readily induced to see that their mail is properly and fully addressed, that return cards are placed on letters, that sufficient postage is affixed and in the proper place, and that all of the facilities of the post office will be used in a proper manner.

There exists in the public mind an impression that proper encouragement is not given to the public generally to bid on contracts covering Government service. The rapid expansion of the Postal Service in the last few years makes these contracts more important than ever before, but unfortunately with the increase in the size of the contract there tends to be a decrease in the number of bidders. Postmasters can render a real service by promptly acquainting the public with advertisements for bids and by explaining the requirements—in other words, by encouraging in every way possible the submission of bids—and thus enable the department to eliminate every phase of graft and resemblance to special privilege.

COLLECTION AND DELIVERY SERVICE.

Special attention will be given during the coming year to the problems of City Delivery and Collection Service, which are becoming of increasing importance since the advent of the parcel post. In the past this phase of the Postal Service has been neglected, and postmasters will be expected to specialize on the administration of their delivery and collection service and the supervision of their carrier force. Local conditions vary so greatly that it is difficult to establish hard and fast rules of administartion or definite service standards. The employees engaged in this service perform their work largely away from the post office, free from surveillance of immediate control. The department has for some time been collecting data from many large post offices, and all postmasters at delivery offices are expected to familiarize themselves with the requirements of the different sections of their communities with a view to determining how many deliveries and collections are essential, and to inquire the connection made by collections with deliveries and by both with train arrivals and departures; they should also study the volume of mail on light and heavy days so as to secure a proper adjustment between the employment of regular carriers and auxiliaries, so as to comply with the eight-in-ten-hour law, and at the same time keep the expenditures down to the minimum amount; they should have close examination made of the office time and street time of carriers and of the general conduct and efficiency of these employees, upon whose service in the last analysis the public is prone to charge the entire performance of the Postal Service.

The failure of many city-delivery patrons to provide mail receptacles occasions great loss of time in every city, and, as a matter of fact, is the source of inconvenience to the patrons themselves. Postmasters have in many cases succeeded, by tactful representations through the medium of circular letters, in accomplishing a great deal to correct this situation, and this campaign should be prudently continued.

Some postmasters have been slow to grasp the policy of the department with relation to the salaries of carriers who are assigned to collection duty and have therefore subjected themselves to embarrassment in carrying out the wish of the department. The regular work of a letter carrier, as contemplated by the salary-classification law, embraces the routing of mail, the house-to-house delivery of letters, papers, and parcels, and the handling of c. o. d. matter. These duties require a degree of capacity and efficiency, for which Congress has provided a maximum salary in first-class offices of $1,200, and in second-class offices of $1,100. The work of collecting mail is also a duty which carriers may be called upon to perform, but this work requires no high degree of expertness or capacity, and it is not proper that carriers in the highest grades should be assigned to such work. Accordingly, the department has directed postmasters to assign to the work of collecting mail all the new and less experienced, as well as the less efficient carriers receiving not more than $1,000 a year. In cases of carriers receiving in excess of this salary and performing collection work, the postmasters are required to assign them to delivery work and to give them every opportunity to demonstrate their capacity to perform that work. It has developed that some of the collectors are not competent to perform regular delivery work, while others have signified their desire not to undertake that work, preferring to accept a reduction in salary which would permit of their retention in the service. The salary adjustments in this connection do not follow from any arbitrary division of carriers into two classes, as some postmasters have seemed to think, but are the result of a recognition of the relative efficiency of individual carriers. All collectors will be permitted at any time to undertake delivery work and earn promotion as letter distributors or into the clerical line.

EQUIPMENT.

Postmasters are expected to interest themselves in the equipment provided for their offices and in their proper maintenance. This is especially true of automobiles, which, with the passing of horse-drawn vehicles and with the establishment of consolidated screen wagon and delivery and collection services, will become an important feature of the service at all of the larger offices. They should maintain close surveillance over the performance of contractors, including carriers who furnish their own outfits, to see that the rights of the Government are protected, that equipment at all times presents a creditable appearance, and that Government-owned equipment is given the most careful and most circumspect surveillance.

CASE EXAMINATIONS.

Postmasters should be very strict in their requirements that all employees who handle mail, or might under any conditions be called upon to handle mail, take case examinations at least once a year in order to demonstrate their ability to perform this work, which must be considered as having an important bearing on their status in the office. This plan will be of the greatest service to postmasters in meeting the emergencies which arise in their service, especially during the holiday season.

SANITATION.

There is reflected in our Postal Service to-day the result of a campaign which has been waged in this country for several years in the interest of better sanitary conditions and more careful protection of the lives and health of employees and patrons. This is right. It is an evidence of education and progress to be encouraged by the Government, especially in the post offices, which are recognized as the civic centers of their communities. The department therefore has little patience with the postmaster who has not interpreted this "handwriting" and does not make every effort to keep his office clean and avoid criticism.

These are but a few of the many things which a postmaster may do to increase the business and effectiveness of his office. Others equally as important will no doubt receive the careful and intelligent consideration of this convention, and the success of your counsels will depend on the manner in which the digested and assimilated experience and wisdom of the strongest postmasters here are appropriated and utilized by the weakest of our force.

In closing I take pleasure in stating that, in my opinion, the Postal Service never before had a more zealous, a more intelligent, and a more effective corps of postmasters than is now in immediate command of our army of postal reservists who are serving and protecting our great American people and the institutions of which we are all justly proud.

It has been heretofore, and shall continue to be, my earnest endeavor to support and closely cooperate with you in meeting the public's expectations of you, and in turn I thank you for the loyal support which I confidently expect for the department.

The following is a paper sent to the convention of the Post Office Clerks' Association:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington.

THE DEPARTMENT'S VIEWPOINT ON THE POSTAL EMPLOYEE.

To the post-office clerks of the United States assembled in convention in the beautiful city of Los Angeles, I send cordial greetings and best wishes for an enjoyable vacation and profitable stimulus for the great public work of the Postal Service in which we are all engaged.

Those engaged in similar work have a natural bond of sympathy and union, and this condition manifests itself in the establishment of institutions that reflect the common interests and ideals of its members. Postal employees are naturally no exception to this principle. The common responsibilities of the Postal Service should and do maintain a close personal relationship throughout the entire personnel from the highest official to the lowest employee. A keen sense on my part of my relationship in this respect to all the post-office employees prompts me to speak to you at this time in such a direct manner as might be misunderstood, but for a recognition on your part that this relationship is mutual.

The American Postal Service is the only branch of the National Government that bears a striking resemblance to the great business institutions which are owned and operated by private citizens. In fact, a specious comparison may be drawn between the Postal Service and any of the great corporations through which huge amalgamations of capital are nowadays made effective in the activities of private business. The proceeds of taxation is our capital, the people are our stockholders, Congress is our board of directors, the President of the United States is the president of our enterprise, the Postmaster General is our general manager, the officers of the department are his staff lieutenants, the department is our head office, the post offices are our local branches, and the great army of clerks and carriers is the labor force of the postal organization. The raw material of this public utility is the mailed letter and parcel; its finished product is the letter and parcel delivered. Its business is the communication of intelligence and the transportation of commodities.

The Postal Service resembles a profit-sharing corporation, for its employees are all stockholders and so are its patrons.

In so far as the Postal Service may be compared with the private corporations, it is in some respects the greatest of them all. It operates more branches, utilizes more agencies, completes more transactions, serves more people, employs more labor, and is more vital to the welfare and happiness of all the people than any of them.

The Postal Service has become a wonderful organization, transacting an average of $1,000,000 worth of business a day, through about 300,000 human agents, at 58,000 post offices, to which must be added about 6,500 stations of all kinds, handling annually about 1,000,000,000 parcels, 10,000,000,000 pieces of first-class mail, and more than 1,000,000,000 pounds of second-class matter annually, serving 100,000,000 people in America, and conveying mail to all parts of the world.

In so far as the monopolistic tendency of the private corporations is concerned, the Postal Service is the most complete of all trusts.

A deeper study, however, of the analogy which we have drawn will show conclusively that the apparent similarity of the Postal Service to private corporations is only superficial. There is a fundamental difference running through the entire comparison. It is a difference of origin, ideals, policy, and purpose, and this difference colors every function and activity, changes the relationship of every patron, and alters the status of every employee of the Postal Service as compared with the private corporation.

Corporations, it is said, have no soul. The genius of the American Government is the soul of the Postal Service, which is a common cooperative endeavor of the people. It has its origin not in an act of Congress nor in the private bill of a State legislature, but in the Constitution of the United States; its ideal is not dividends, but the preservation of the Union and the advancement of civilization by the establishment and maintenance of means of communication; its policy is to operate its service not for profit, but for the convenience of the public; and its purpose is not in any sense selfish, but purely and entirely unselfish.

In principle there is all the difference in the world between working for some of the people and working for all of the people. Any plan of action affecting the Postal Service that does not take this principle into account is erroneous, and, if not doomed to failure, will be pernicious in its effects.

Just as the Postal Service is similar in form to a private corporation and its officers similar, apparently, to the representatives of amalgamated private capital, so are the associations of postal employees similar in form to the unions of organized labor. And just as the Postal Service is fundamentally different, in spite of all the superficial similarity, from the private corporation, so the association of postal employees is different from the labor union. The difference, again, is one of origin, ideals, policy, and purpose. The origin of the association of postal employees can not be in the need for resisting the selfish aggression of employers, its ideal can not be the protection of rights that are not assailed, its policy should not be to strive by force to secure concessions in the matter of wages and working conditions, and its purposes should not be selfish.

The department and its employees stand in a fiduciary relation to the people and this trust can not be maintained unless each in a spirit of reasonableness seeks the advantage and success of the other.

Organizations of postal employees have no official status which may be recognized by the department. They are not per se a part of the Postal Service nor are they essential to its conduct or welfare. They are purely unofficial. At the same time they may serve useful purposes and in a manner entirely unobjectionable to the department.

In addition to the information which most employees may secure from attending and participating properly in the discussions of postal problems the fraternal feature would naturally appeal to many, whereby life insurance and other benevolent features might be arranged on such a safe basis as would contribute to the convenience, safety, and happiness of the employees and those dependent upon them.

The social and fraternal features have the greatest value, provided those participating have a common viewpoint and that common viewpoint is not centralized in self but in the great Postal Service, which can be brought to the highest degree of efficiency only by the closest cooperation of every person connected with the service, from the newest substitute to the Postmaster General.

The direction of the Postal Service is partly with the legislative and partly with the executive branch of the Government. Congress enacts the laws, grants the appropriations, and holds the Post Office Department to an accounting for the enforcement of the laws and the disbursement of the appropriations; the department administers the service within the bounds set by Congress, and also studies the service with a view of recommending to Congress changes in the law and the amounts of the necessary appropriations.

The most important problems with which the department has to deal are those relating to personnel, the human element in the Postal Service. In the interest of good service, it is of the greatest importance that the force of employees be kept at the highest possible point of efficiency. A high standard of personal performance must be established and maintained and the conduct of employees kept under the strictest surveillance. I am not unmindful, in this connection, of the solemn responsibility imposed upon those who administer a service to which 300,000 men and women, representing, with their families, more than 1,000,000 individuals, have devoted their lives. Instances of maladministration are no doubt liable to occur, and miscarriage of justice is liable to mark the course of every human institution, but the department officer who forgets his responsibility to the postal employees is unworthy of his trust.

It is the duty of the department to recommend to Congress a suitable scale of salaries, which shall be commensurate with the duties to be performed and graded so as to provide an incentive to the workers and means for recognizing faithful and efficient service. For the proper administration of salary laws equitable systems of efficiency ratings must be established and impartially administered. In these matters the employees are vitally interested, but it is not proper that they should, except under the most extraordinary conditions, urge the advancement of their interests directly to Congress. There can be no objection to granting employees the right of petition to Congress or of appealing under justifiable conditions from the decisions of lower to higher administrative officers. But he who does not recognize that more can be accomplished by the employees and the department heads keeping close together and maintaining common viewpoints than by pulling apart has not gotten far in worthy progress for betterment. The action of employees in preparing and having introduced in Congress bills affecting the Postal Service without previously submitting them to the heads of the department and securing their cooperative endeavor is not only wrong in principle but will, if continued unchecked and unguarded, imperil either the position of the employees or the integrity of the service.

Economic conditions throughout the world are, unfortunately, such that all men may not enjoy the degree of ease and comfort to which every man naturally aspires. But America still offers to its citizens a degree of opportunity and prosperity that makes its shores the haven of the oppressed and needy of other lands and its Government the standard bearer of civilization. If we preserve our heritage of natural wealth and free institutions, our children's children may live their lives in peace and plenty. It is imperatively necessary that the integrity of our Government be maintained, that the confidence of the people in our political institutions be not impaired, and that our public services be conducted for the welfare of the people and not for the gain of any class or the selfish interest of those who are intrusted with the administration and operation of those services.

The Government is only incidentally an employer of labor, and it is no part of its function to establish new standards of wages. For the great mass of workers these standards must be fixed by the economic demand and supply, influenced as it is by the collective bargainings of organized capital and organized labor. For the Government to ignore the standards fixed by these forces and to make wages in the Postal Service unduly attractive would result in the reestablishment of the spoils system and place an unwarranted drain on the Public Treasury. There are good and valid reasons, in my opinion, why the salaries paid by the Postal Service should be from 15 to 20 per cent higher than in similar employments in private business, but a scale that would give Government employees much in excess of this would not be advisable or expedient. I may say that it is the plan and endeavor of the Postmaster General to recognize and grade salaries in accordance with this scale.

There should be no need in the Postal Service for organized efforts of employees to influence salary legislation. Both Congress and the department are interested in the welfare of the postal employees, but the department is even more solicitous of their welfare than Congress can be, because to the department, more than elsewhere, are known the demands made upon the employees, the problems and difficulties which they encounter, the value of their services, and the degree of their loyalty and faithfulness.

Another unfortunate tendency is that which has been manifested by some employees in inducing outside and organized influence to argue before the department questions of discipline. Again, I repeat that the Postal Service is not a heartless corporation that would grind the faces of those who serve it, but a cooperative endeavor that has the good of all and the harm of none in mind. The doors of the department and the minds of its officials will always be open to appeals based on statements of facts from individual employees. When the department is approached by employees with such facts in their cases, errors and wrongs will be readily redressed.

I have said that the department has a clear duty to perform in promoting the welfare and protecting the rights of its employees. This is all the more incumbent on the department for the reason that these employees in entering the service of the Government must for the public good relinquish the exercise of part of their political rights. On the other hand, it is the duty of the department to see to it that the work of its employees is properly supervised and directed so that the people may receive an adequate return for the expenditure of public funds.

As a matter of fact, if the department pursues a truly enlightened policy in protecting the public interest, it can not fail to protect fully at the same time the interests of its employees. Any effort to oppress or harass the employees with a view to increasing the return from their labor will defeat the object of such a shortsighted policy. The first requisite of efficient service is a loyal and satisfied working force. It is therefore the first duty of the department to provide conditions under which its employees may reasonably be expected to be satisfied and loyal. Conversely, it is the duty of the employees to accept reasonable working conditions cheerfully and to render their very best and most loyal service. No man can do his best work unless he is in love with his work; and no man can be in love with his work if he permits himself to harbor sentiments of discontent and selfishness. The department and the employees must get together and work together, casting aside forever all motives or selfish aggrandizement on both sides.

The greatest bar to this ideal condition is the liability of misunderstanding. Emergencies create hardships that can not at once be relieved; general orders for the good of the service must be promulgated; the inefficient can not be so generously dealt with as the efficient; discipline in individual cases must take its course. In the nature of things the administrative action of the department can not be subject to review by the employees, nor can the department be continually explaining and justifying its policies in respect to personnel. Herein lies the opportunity of the malcontent and the agitator. Out of a lack of understanding he creates misunderstanding, to the detriment of both the department and any misguided employees who accept his leadership. To overcome this destructive tendency, it is only necessary that the officers of the department follow unsweveringly a high-minded policy of even-handed justice and that the employees cherish a spirit of accommodation and a loyal willingness to believe that the department is at all times mindful of their just claims and desirous of promoting their immediate and ultimate welfare.

There has existed in the past in many of the larger post offices an unscientific and ineffective plan of organization. Rather, it was a lack of any plan. The work of the post office was broken up and assigned to four, five, or six independent and unrelated divisions. The employees and officers of these divisions were not required or permitted to know much of the other divisions or of the general work of the post office. There resulted duplications in work, loss of time, and lax methods. It was clearly the duty of the department to reform this condition. Seventy-three large post offices have now been reorganized on the two-division plan. Action looking to the reorganization of all others is now under way. Now, how has this affected the employees? At first the unfamiliarity of a new régime and the necessity for many to master new work and assume new responsibilities was somewhat of a hardship. The reorganizations revealed the relative inefficiency of some employees and the high qualifications of others, and the necessary reduction of some might not to their minds be compensated by the promotion of others. It is seen that this new plan simplifies the organization and thus brings the men in closer touch with the fewer and higher supervisory heads. At the same time it gives to all employees an opportunity to serve an apprenticeship in more important duties and demonstrate their knowledge and adaptability in a wider field.

Where the service will permit the department favors the eight-hour workday and has labored most industriously, and I think effectively, to conform the service to the requirements of the eight-hour-in-ten law.

The department is in hearty accord with the provision made by Congress recently for indemnifying employees who are injured in the line of duty, and while this provision was not made effective by appropriation until this spring the department has already approved over 300 claims.

More than ever before the department is giving attention to the suitability of Federal buildings and post-office quarters, stressing the features of ventilation, light, and sanitation, which have a direct and important bearing both on the welfare and the efficiency of the employees.

Again, the department is constantly endeavoring to standardize methods, to use short-cuts in mailing operations, to introduce approved labor-saving devices, and in every way to advance the dispatch and delivery of the mails, and to reduce the cost of the service to the people. This can not be done without the whole-hearted cooperation of the employees, and there is no disposition on the part of the department to do this at the expense of the employees.

Labor-saving machines and improved methods have ever been a blessing to mankind. As the result of these it is said that every adult American citizen has working for him tirelessly the equivalent of not less than 22 mechanical slaves. The ultimate benefit of the labor-saving device must be acknowledged. But it is true that the temporary displacement of human labor may cause hardship if the whole burden is permitted to fall on the employees displaced. It is, in my opinion, the duty of the employer, no less of the people as an employer in the Postal Service, to provide as far as possible other labor suitable to their capacities for those who are displaced. This the Post Office Department will very largely be able to do for efficient men, because the demand for Postal Service increases more rapidly than new machines. In the Postal Service we have saved the equivalent of the labor of thousands of employees by introducing labor-saving machines and new methods, but every year brings new recruits to the postal ranks and an abundance of opportunity for those in the service.

In all the efforts of the department for the betterment of the Postal Service and in all the aspirations of the employees to reach the ear of the department with suggestions and requests, the postmaster is the natural medium. The department holds the postmaster to a strict accountability for the satisfactory conduct of the Postal Service at his post office and for the just and impartial administration of the laws and regulations affecting the employees. In thus representing the employees before the department and the department to the employees, the postmaster's responsibility is very great. This arrangement, however, is correct, for I believe that a successful and effective organization must be capable of delegating large powers to its subordinates. I also believe that it should develop its directors and higher executives among the ranks of workers, and that the time must come in this great organization when the recognition of loyalty and efficiency will provide a method of promotions which will permit the lowest employee to demonstrate through time and experience his ability to occupy every position at the post office from that of substitute clerk or carrier to the position of postmaster.

DANIEL C. ROPER.

The following paper was read to the convention of the National Letter Carriers' Association:

RECOGNITION OF THE HUMAN ELEMENT IN THE POSTAL SERVICE.

To the letter carriers of the United States assembled in convention at Omaha I send cordial greetings and best wishes for an enjoyable vacation and profitable stimulus for the great public work of the Postal Service in which we are all engaged.

The carriers as well as the clerks are intimately affected by the new plan of organization. Their work comes more directly under the supervision of the superintendent of mails, and a better opportunity is now afforded for effecting the transfer of carriers, in accordance with the department's disposition to recognize merit wherever found, to the clerical force where they will have the full advantage of that line of service and promotions.

The regular work of a letter carrier as contemplated by the salary-classification law embraces the routing of mail, the house-to-house delivery of letters, papers, and parcels, and the handling of registered and C. O. D. matter. These duties require a degree of capacity and efficiency for which Congress has provided a maximum salary in first-class offices of $1,200 and in second-class offices of $1,100. Some carriers have also to be assigned to the duty of collecting mail from deposit boxes. Very obviously this work is not so arduous and does not require as high qualifications as the work of delivery. Consequently the department has required postmasters to assign to the work of collecting mail only the new and less experienced as well as the less efficient carriers receiving not more than $1,000 a year. In the cases of carriers receiving in excess of this salary and performing collection work, the postmasters are required to assign them to delivery work and to give them every opportunity to demonstrate their capacity to perform that work. Some of the collectors, it has developed, are not competent to perform regular delivery work, and others have signified their desire not to undertake that work, but rather to accept the reduction in salary, which would permit of their retention in the service. The salary adjustments in this connection do not follow from any arbitrary division of carriers into two classes, but are the result of recognizing the relative efficiency of individual carriers. All collectors will be permitted to undertake delivery work and earn promotion at any time. Certainly, upon reflection every carrier will see the justice of this plan both to the carrier force and to the service.

Where the service will permit, the department favors the eight-hour workday and has labored most industriously and, I think, effectively to conform the service to the requirements of the 8 hour in 10 law.

The department is in hearty accord with the provision made by Congress recently for indemnifying employees who are injured in the line of duty, and while this provision was not made effective by appropriation until this spring the department has already approved over 300 claims.

More than ever before the department is giving attention to the suitability of Federal buildings and post-office quarters, stressing the features of ventilation, light, and sanitation, which have a direct and important bearing both on the welfare and the efficiency of the employees.

Again, the department is constantly endeavoring to standardize methods, to use short cuts in mailing operations, to introduce approved labor-saving devices, and in every way to advance the dispatch and delivery of the mails and to reduce the cost of the service to the people. This can not be done without the whole-hearted cooperation of the employees, and there is no disposition on the part of the department to do this at the expense of the employees.

Labor-saving machines and improved methods have ever been a blessing to mankind. As the result of these it is said that every adult American citizen has working for him tirelessly the equivalent of not less than 22 mechanical slaves. The ultimate benefit of the labor-saving device must be acknowledged. But it is true that the temporary displacement of human labor may cause hardship if the whole burden is permitted to fall on the employees displaced. It is, in my opinion, the duty of the employer, no less of the people as an employer in the Postal Service, to provide as far as possible other labor suitable to their capacities for those who are displaced. This the department will very largely be able to do for efficient men, because the demand for postal service increases more rapidly than new machines. In the Postal Service we have saved the equivalent of the labor of thousands of employees by introducing labor-saving machines and new methods, but every year brings new recruits to the postal ranks and an abundance of opportunity for those in the service.

In all the efforts of the department for the betterment of the Postal Service and in all the aspirations of the employees to reach the ear of the department with suggestions and requests, the postmaster is the natural medium. The department holds the postmaster to a strict accountability for the satisfactory conduct of the postal service at his post office and for the just and impartial administration of the laws and regulations affecting the employees. In thus representing the employees before the department and the department to the employees, the postmaster's responsibility is very great. This arrangement, however, is correct, for I believe that a successful and effective organization must be capable of delegating large powers to its subordinates. I also believe that it should develop its directors and higher executives among the ranks of workers, and that the time must come in this great organization when the recognition of loyalty and efficiency will provide a method of promotions which will permit the lowest employee to demonstrate through time and experience his ability to occupy every position at the post office from that of substitute clerk or carrier to the position of postmaster.

DANIEL C. ROPER.

In these papers the First Assistant Postmaster General sets up a standard for the employees to follow which is not in keeping with the policy that the officials have actually pursued. He first sets out by stating that "the common responsibilities of the Postal Service should and do maintain a close personal relationship throughout the entire personnel, from the highest official to the lowest employee." He then draws comparison between business institutions and the American Postal Service, and deals in high-sounding phrases regarding the utilities and purposes for which the Postal Service is organized. He then draws a comparison between positions of postal employees and employees of corporations organized into unions and affiliated with organized labor. In dealing with this subject, Mr. Roper made the following statement:

The origin of the association of postal employees can not be in the need for resisting the selfish aggression of employers, its ideal can not be the protection of rights that are not assailed, its policy should not be to strive by force to secure concessions in the matter of wages and working conditions, and its purpose should not be selfish.

The department and its employees stand in a fiduciary relation to the people, and this trust can not be maintained unless each in a spirit of reasonableness seeks the advantage and success of the other.

Organizations of postal employees have no official status which may be recognized by the department. They are not per se a part of the Postal Service, nor are they essential to its conduct or welfare. They are purely unofficial. At the same time they may serve useful purposes and in a manner entirely unobjectionable to the department.

Continuing on with his lecture, he soars into visionary clouds, dealing in honeyed words and in statements that the postal employees know do not fit with the conditions as they actually exist in the Postal Service. He draws attention to the duties of the employees, of which he has but a mere theoretical knowledge; he expresses his opinion about laws, the practical workings of which he is unfamiliar with. He states the department is in hearty accord with the provisions of the compensation law for injured employees, when the facts of the matter are that every obstacle has been placed in the way of paying legitimate claims of the employees who have come under the provisions of this act. He speaks about the interest of the department in providing proper ventilation and lighting and sanitation in post offices, while hundreds of employees are being paid sick benefits by the employees' associations for diseases contracted in post offices where insanitary conditions exist, and partly concludes by trying to impress on the minds of the employees what a wonderful thing his speed-up-stop-watch system is for the service, when, in fact, it is destroying the harmony and cooperation that should exist in the Postal Service owing to the added and excessive burdens that are being heaped on a defenseless body of men. He finishes his harangue by insulting the intelligence of the vast army of men and women under his command by stating that—in order for the employees to reach the ear of the department with suggestions and requests and complaints that the postmaster is the natural medium through which they should be made.

It is unfortunate that the conduct of a great public service should be permitted to rest in the hands of a man with such narrow-minded, restricted, and un-American views. I commend to the attention of Mr. Roper, for his serious consideration, the report of the United States Commission on Industrial Relations with reference to the reasons given for causes of the unrest existing throughout the country:

1. Refusal to permit employees to become members of labor organizations; and

2. Refusal to meet or confer with the authorized representatives of employees.

In dealing with the subjects the commission states that the crux of the whole question of industrial relations is declared to be, Shall the workers, for the protection of their interests, be organized and represented collectively by their chosen delegates, even as the stockholders are represented by their directors and by the various grades of executive officials and bosses?

I might say, for the benefit of Mr. Roper, that the postal employees are not organized for the purpose of resisting selfish aggression of employers; nor do they aim to attempt to secure by force rights in the matter of wages and working conditions. These postal organizations stand for betterment of the service and for a higher understanding and regard between the officials and the employees. The fraternal features of these organizations provide for the care of their members in case of illness, and after burying their deceased brothers they leave with the members of the families of deceased members a sufficient sum to tide them over their immediate difficulties until such time as they can arrange for some means for support. Their ideals and purposes are not selfish, and the things they have accomplished in the past are evidence of this unselfishness and the mirror of the things they are striving to accomplish in the future .

It is very easy to talk about the department and the employees standing in a fiduciary relationship to the people, and that they must be mutually just and reasonable in their efforts to achieve success. How can any kind of equitable relationship exist between the department and the employees if the employees are not permitted to present their grievances or complaints or their desires unless it be through the medium of the postmaster.

The First Assistant Postmaster General states that organizations of postal employees are not essential to the conduct or welfare of the Postal Service. Well, strictly speaking, this may be true; but I ask Mr. Roper what would become of the victims of his speed-up system, and the 150-day rule, and the rest of his systems that wantonly use up the vitality of the employees and leaves them sick and worn out, if it were not for these organizations of postal employees? He would have many problems on his hands that are now solved for him by men who have spent the best years of their lives in raising the Postal Service to a high standard of efficiency, and which he, in his misconception of his duty, has thrown into a state of chaos by the feeling of unrest and discontent which exists among the employees, for which he is largely responsible. These organizations are not unreasonable in their requests, as can be attested to by many members of this body. They merely aim to assist the men to put themselves on a human basis and to be treated with justice tempered with humanity.

Mr. Roper states that the Postal Service is not a heartless corporation that would grind out the last ounce of energy and then discard the wreck, and that the department and the minds of its officials are always unprejudiced and ready to alleviate the burdens of those who appeal for a remedy. This may be true from the viewpoint of the First Assistant Postmaster General, yet day after day old veterans in the service, who have served long and faithfully and endured all the hardships and privations incident to their positions without murmur, are removed from the service to make way for younger men. Is it any wonder that the terror aroused by such an impending fate should lead the men to make an earnest attempt to secure recognition of their plight and relief from such difficulties.

The department does not care to take cognizance of this state of affairs, nor do they seemingly wish to be bothered or annoyed with the future welfare of the employees. In order to shift the responsibility, Mr. Roper suggests that the postmasters act as a medium between the employees and the department. If his suggestion is to be followed it will mean that the employees will be powerless to state the true conditions to the department, as this would be left to the mere whim of the postmaster to use his own sweet judgment whether he would be warranted in asking or recommending redress of grievances.

In his statement to the employees Mr. Roper says:

There should be no need in the Postal Service for organized efforts of employees to influence salary legislation. Both Congress and the department are interested in the welfare of the postal employees, but the department is even more solicitous of their welfare than Congress can be, because to the department, more than elsewhere, are known the demands made upon the employees, the problems and difficulties which they encounter, the value of their services, and the degree of their loyalty and faithfulness.

Does Mr. Roper actually believe the above statement, or has he the impression that he is dealing with a class of men whom he can fool with statements that will not square with his official acts? What explanation can Mr. Roper give to the employees for his speech before the postmasters of Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina on October 6, 1914, in which he is quoted as follows:

The loss suffered by the Government as the result of superannuation in the public service is growing more marked year by year. Probably in no branch of the Government is this loss proportionately greater than in the Postal Service, where alertness, dexterity, quickness of hand and eye, and other qualities of youth are particularly required for the most efficient performance of the work in connection with the mails. The parcel post has greatly emphasized this.

We did not create this distressing situation, but we must deal with it. There is no valid reason why positions in the Postal Service should be retained by those unable to fill them. The function of the Post Office Department is administrative, not legislative. The law does not provide for pensions, and neither does it provide for permanence of tenure in the civil service. On the contrary, it specifically provides that incompetent employees shall be removed; and that means all those who on account of advanced years or other causes are not rendering an adequate "quid pro quo" for their salaries.

The law does not provide that length of service shall establish any claim on the part of the employee or any obligation on the part of the Government that is not effaced by the payment of the concurrent salary. If this situation is to be changed, Congress only can do it, and let us be perfectly frank and say that it is not probable that the people of this country will ever indorse a system of civil pensions.

Some postmasters refrain for humanitarian reasons from recommending the removal of aged employees. The result is that the tenure of office in the Government service does not now depend on the law or on the uniform needs of the service, but upon the varying temperaments of the postmasters and their varying conceptions of their public duty. This condition is wrong and works injustice to the employees and loss to the Government. The only proper course, and the one prompted by humanitarian interests, is for every postmaster to put on notice all his employees that they will be continued in office only so long as they are capable of earning the salaries paid them, and that salaries will be scaled and readjusted to meet the declining efficiency and earning power of the older clerks and carriers. This course will encourage thrift and induce all to provide against old age. It will increase the efficiency of the service and reduce its cost. It is based on justice and fairness to all and on the only possible interpretation of the existing law.

Does that statement show much solicitude on the part of the Post Office Department officials for the welfare of the employees who have devoted their entire lives to the Postal Service? Does Mr. Roper believe that statement has inspired the confidence of the postal employees in the department officials?

Let us go a step further and see with what tender solicitude the Post Office Department officials deal with the employees who become sick and disabled and are unable to perform their official duties. I desire to draw the attention of the House to an order issued by the Post Office officials, which reads as follows:

Postmasters may, in addition to the leave of absence with pay provided by law, grant leave of absence without pay to clerks and carriers in case of illness, disability received in the service, or other urgent necessity, such leave not to exceed 30 days in any one calendar year. An application for leave of absence to cover a longer period in cases of illness must be submitted by the postmaster to the First Assistant Postmaster General with a full statement of the facts, but leave for more than 150 days in one calendar year will not be granted in any such case. Clerks and carriers who desire to be absent for longer periods will be dropped from the rolls without prejudice. Unnecessary absence without pay will adversely affect the employees' efficiency records.

And now, Mr. Chairman, let me explain the effect of this order on the employees. Should a post-office clerk or letter carrier or railway mail clerk contract disease or become incapacitated from performing his duties, even though the illness be contracted in line of their official duties, they are required, regardless of all human laws, to become well enough to report for duty within the period of 150 days. If perchance they are afflicted with a long-suffering disease and the human frame has not been able to recuperate from the ravages of their ailment, they are without ceremony or regard for their record in the service summarily removed from their positions. This is a harsh and pitiless rule, which has been promulgated by the Post Office Department officials and has worked untold hardship on hundreds of faithful employees who have been removed from their positions on account of illness contracted in the service. Does Mr. Roper contend that this rule, which has been made part of the postal laws and regulations, is for the welfare of the postal employees, and that the department was solicitous of their welfare when this order was issued? Has he been solicitous of the welfare of those employees whose condition did not permit of their returning to duty at the end of 150 days when he positively refused to make any exception regardless of the merits of the particular case? Is he solicitous of the welfare of the employees when he knows deep down in his heart that this rule has retarded the recovery of men who were ill, owing to the fear confronting them that they would be dropped from the service at the end of 150 days?

Mr. Roper may be deceiving himself into the belief that his acts have been caused by solicitation for the welfare of the employees, but he will have a materially hard time in explaining these matters to the satisfaction of the postal employees.

The order issued to postmasters by Post Office Department officials, reducing the salaries of letter carriers assigned to collection duty to $1,000 a year is another act of the Post Office officials that was, no doubt, made with a view of helping this particular body of men. No doubt Mr. Roper was solicitous for the welfare of these letter carriers when he ordered a reduction of $200 a year in their salaries. It is my opinion, Mr. Chairman, that if the several thousand letter carriers who have had their salaries reduced could be brought together in one large hall, Mr. Roper would have a hard time in convincing them that he was solicitous for their welfare when he issued the order reducing their salaries. I again repeat, that he might be fooling himself into the belief that he had the welfare of the employees at heart, but he would have a materially hard time fooling the employees into this belief.

Were the department officials solicitous for the welfare of the employees when they inaugurated the stop-watch-speed-up system? This system, which has been repudiated and found to be a failure wherever the attempt has been made to put it into effect, is now being tried on the Post Office employees, and with the same result that it has met in industrial plants, and in the arsenals and navy yards of the Government. It has demoralized the Railway Mail Service and has thrown the City Delivery Service into a state of chaos, the effects of which can not be foretold.

Judging from the information I have received from employees in post offices in all parts of the country, there is a feeling of unrest and discontent existing among the postal employees caused by the impositions being placed on them by the administrative officers of the Post Office Department that can not but be harmful to the whole Postal Service.

I desire to draw the attention of the Members of this body to a recent order issued by First Assistant Postmaster General Roper, showing his solicitude for the welfare of the postal employees:

As the primary function of the Postal Establishment is service to the public, it is believed that even though the suspension of delivery service on the holidays enumerated in section 284 of the Postal Laws and Regulations might be justified by the sentiment of a majority of the business patrons, service should not be entirely suspended as other patrons are entitled to equal consideration in the delivery of mail. The numerous complaints received by the department from patrons on account of the complete suspension of mail delivery and collection on such holidays prompted the department to invite the opinions of a number of representative postmasters, and their reports show clearly that at least one delivery over the entire territory should be made in addition to the prompt handling of special-delivery matter and perishable parcels. Collection service necessary to avoid complaints on account of delays in dispatch should also be given.

Postmasters will, therefore, act accordingly hereafter in the matter of service to be given by letter carriers on holidays.

I have been informed that in a large number of post offices throughout the country certain holidays were observed and, according to custom and with the consent and approval of the public, the post offices were closed on these holidays. Postmasters, who are presumed to conduct the service in their respective offices for the best interest of the public, have had authority to close post offices on holidays, or, if necessary, to give such service to the public that, in his opinion, the public demanded. It seems that holidays are being more generally observed by the public throughout the country, and wherever there was no demand for postal service on these days postmasters gave their employees the benefit of a holiday. This, however, did not seem to be conducive to the welfare of the employees, and the First Assistant Postmaster General issued an order which required postmasters to open their offices on all holidays, in order that the letter carriers might be required to work on those days. As there was no public demand for the issuance of this order, we can only assume that Mr. Roper had in mind his deep solicitude for the welfare of the employees when he issued this order placing additional burdens upon them.

In his paper to the postal employees Mr. Roper closes with the following statement:

I also believe that it should develop its directors and higher executives among the ranks of workers, and that the time must come in this great organization when the recognition of loyalty and efficiency will provide a method of promotions which will permit the lowest employee to demonstrate through time and experience his ability to occupy every position at the post office from that of substitute clerk or carrier to the position of postmaster.

That sounds very plausible, and if the statement was made with sincerity it would be applauded, not only by the public but by the employees to whom the statement was made. But is it true, Mr. Chairman? If I am correctly informed, the promotions that have been made to the higher positions in first and second class post offices have not been made from the employees in those offices. When a vacancy exists in a post office it is customary for the department officials to recommend to the postmaster the appointment of an employee that has little or no experience in the work of a city post office. The explanation, or rather the excuse, given for recommending these appointments are that the men are experts and highly qualified to fill the particular positions where vacancies occur. I have also been informed that in order to justify these recommendations the post-office inspectors have been sent to post offices presumably to make investigations, and in doing so they would try and impress upon the postmaster the fact that he did not have in his office a man that was qualified to fill the particular supervisory position.

If the postmaster was desirous of currying favor with the department officials at Washington, he would agree to accept the suggestion or recommendation of the department official and accept into his office a man who probably had no experience whatever in the work of a city post office, and no matter how capable he might be it would be necessary for him to learn the duties of his particular position to which he had been assigned. The transfer of employees from the department and from the Railway Mail Service and from the Post Office Inspectors' Division to the preferred places in city post offices has to a large extent been responsible for arousing a feeling of antagonism and resentment of the employees, who were actually entitled to have these promotions made from their ranks in accordance with the act approved March 2, 1907. It may be that the Post Office Department officials are solicitous for the welfare of the employees in city post offices, by denying them the opportunity of advancement to the higher positions in their respective offices. If this be true, then it is my opinion that the rank and file of the employees and the Post Office Department officials are at variance regarding their respective views on this particular subject. I have also been informed that the promotions of letter carriers in city post offices to supervisory positions are tabooed by Post Office Department officials. If my information is correct, and it has been verified by employees in several post offices, a letter carrier can not be promoted to a supervisory position, no matter how capable or efficient he might be. In order to discourage and prevent the promotion of letter carriers, the department officials have devised a scheme whereby letter carriers must take an examination and be transferred to a position in the clerical service, and if he succeeds in this he can be recommended by the postmaster to a higher position whenever a vacancy exists. When we take into consideration the fact that post-office clerks and letter carriers take the same examination when applying for positions in the civil service, and that each of them, while performing separate and distinct duties, are, nevertheless, in close relationship to each other, and understand to a large extent the duties that each performs, still, in order to keep down the letter carriers, who are most persistent in trying to protect their rights, they are confronted with obstacles in the form of rules and regulations that are made for the purpose of nullifying the statute passed by Congress, which opened the way for their advancement to higher positions in the Postal Service.

The First Assistant Postmaster General informed the letter carriers in his paper to their national convention that the officials are solicitous for the welfare of the employees, and we must assume that in placing obstacles in the way of advancement of these men he has their welfare at heart. It is my opinion, however, that the letter carriers can not be fooled by any statement of Mr. Roper that is in direct conflict with their best interests.

In looking over the report of the Post Office Department submitted in December, 1914, I find the following recommendations for legislation made by the Postmaster General:

First. To repeal the law that grants compensatory time to employees who are required to work on Sunday and compel them, if necessary, to work seven days each week.

Second. He recommended that the pay of substitute employees be reduced 5 cents an hour for vacation service and 10 cents an hour for service rendered in place of employees off duty without pay, and if his recommendation met the approval of Congress, it would further reduce the compensation of a class of employees who do not have sufficient income under present conditions to keep body and soul together.

Third. He recommended a repeal of the classification law so that employees could not be promoted to any grade in less than two years. If this recommendation were approved by Congress, it would take an employee 12 years, under the most favorable conditions, before he could possibly reach the maximum salary of $1,200 in first-class post offices. The Postmaster General, no doubt, had in view a speed-up system which would have used up the vitality of a man within 12 years, after which time he would start to go down grade, and according to the Burleson system he would be reduced in salary each year, and in a few years more he would be ready to be dropped out of the service entirely.

Fourth. He recommended a repeal of the 8-hour law for post-office clerks and letter carriers, and suggested as a substitute what he terms a 48-hour-a-week law, which had been in force in the service and was found so unsatisfactory that Congress, after mature deliberation, amended it and enacted the 8-hour law in its stead.

I find in the report of the First Assistant Postmaster General: First, that he recommended abolishing the office of assistant postmaster; second, that he has inaugurated a policy to nullify the classification act of 1907, in so far as it provides for transfers and promotions of letter carriers to the higher positions in post offices; third, he recommended the repeal of the 8-hour law; fourth, he recommended a reduction in pay of substitute clerks and letter carriers; fifth, he recommended abolishing the law that grants compensatory time for Sunday services and which insures the day of rest each week for the employees.

He drew attention to the superannuated employees in the Postal Service, and chloroformed his conscience with the statement that the present postal officials are not responsible for the unfortunate condition that exists; but claims it is their duty to deal with it by removing the employees who have become incompetent or inefficient on account of superannuation. He concludes his report by acknowledging the loyal and efficient cooperation of the employees, and by so doing he satisfies his conscience, no doubt, to the extent that all his recommendations are in the interest of the vast army of employees under his jurisdiction.

Owing to the failure of passage of the Post Office appropriation bill in the closing session of the Sixty-third Congress, a joint resolution was introduced and passed by both Houses of Congress on March 4, 1915, continuing the appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, on the same basis as contained in the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915. This joint resolution contained the following provisions:

That letter carriers assigned to collection service who were promoted to the higher grades in accordance with the classification act approved March 2, 1907, and whose salaries have been reduced during the past year, through no delinquency or charges of misconduct on their part, shall be restored to their former grades.

The provision affecting letter carriers in the City Delivery Service was placed in the joint resolution as a protest against a system that had been inaugurated by the department officials whereby letter carriers who were assigned to collection duty had had their salary reduced $200 a year. These reductions in salaries were the subject of considerable discussion in both Houses of Congress, and after mature deliberation it was decided to restore the employees who had been reduced in salaries to their former grades. During the discussion on this subject several communications were inserted in the RECORD containing copies of correspondence between the department officials and postmasters in first and second class post offices of the policy that was to be pursued in bringing about the reductions in salaries of these employees.

Notwithstanding the provision contained in the joint resolution restoring these letter carriers to their former grades, the Post Office Department officials in defiance of the express will of the legislative body continued the practice and have reduced a large number of letter carriers $200 a year who are assigned in whole or in part to collection duty.

This is unquestionably more evidence of the solicitude for the welfare of the employees by the department officials, but those who have suffered a reduction of $200 in their salaries do not seem to view it in the same light as the Postmaster General and his First Assistant.

The statements made by Mr. Roper to the conventions of postal employees have not deceived anyone, unless it be the First Assistant Postmaster General himself. Mr. Roper simply voices the sentiment of Postmaster General Burleson in expressing his disfavor against all forms of organizations of employees. Were it not for the act of August 24, 1912, known as the antigag law, the Postmaster General and his First Assistant would long since have vented their spleen against the organizations of postal employees and would, no doubt, have attempted to destroy them.

The policy of economy that has been instituted in the Postal Service has had a harmful effect on the efficiency of the employees, and the curtailment of the service in all its branches is being protested by the citizens in all parts of the country. The railway mail clerks and post-office clerks are speeded up to the highest possible tension. Rural delivery carriers are kept in a constant state of fear on account of the rearrangement and extension of the rural delivery routes, and the city letter carriers are loaded down with parcel-post matter to such an extent that thousands of them are suffering from ruptures caused by the strain of carrying excessively heavy loads. All these impositions may be a solicitude on the part of the Post Office Department officials for the welfare of the employees, but the employees do not view it in that light.

It is no doubt the desire of the officials of the Post Office Department to suppress the truth of the actual conditions that exist in the Postal Service, but in this they will fail, as the condition prevailing among the rank and file of the employees is one that must be remedied, or it will result in untold harm to the whole Postal Service. For the information of the Post Office Department officials I desire to state that the higher the office the greater the power, the wider the influence, and the greater the responsibility, the more important it is that there be a full and free discussion and honest criticism of official action. No man can oppose such discussion and such criticism without doing violence to the principles of liberty upon which this Government was founded. There should be no reason for protest against the closest scrutiny of the inner workings of the Postal Service by the officials, without tacitly admitting that their policies are open to suspicion and can not be defended. There should be no reason for suppressing or holding the truth from the public, and an opportunity should be given the employees to present their side of the case to the public without fear of incurring official displeasure. The people of our country favor a square deal for faithful postal employees. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, before concluding my remarks on the pending appropriation bill, I will read to the House a very illuminating paper which sets forth with clearness many of the subjects I have discussed and many more about which it will be well for us all to be informed. It was presented to me by Mr. Frank T. Rogers, the president of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks. It is a copy of a memorial to the Postmaster General, submitted by this association, and reads as follows:

[Memorial to the Postmaster General, being a synopsis of the resolutions adopted by the sixteenth annual convention of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks, held at Los Angeles, Cal., Sept. 6, 7, 8, and 9, 1915.]

PLEDGE OF LOYALTY TO THE SERVICE.

The sixteenth annual convention of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks, by formal action, renewed the often-repeated pledge of our association to earnestly cooperate with the Post Office Department in every possible way, to the end that the efficiency of the Postal Service shall be brought to the highest possible standard.

RETIREMENT OF SUPERANNUATED EMPLOYEES.

Our convention adopted a resolution declaring it to be of paramount importance to the membership of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks that the Congress of the United States enact legislation at the earliest day possible to provide for the retirement of the superannuated post-office clerks with a sufficient allowance to protect them against poverty in their declining years.

To this end the department is earnestly petitioned to recommend such legislation as will accomplish this purpose.

Superannuation in the Postal Service is an existing condition that has long been recognized by the heads of the Post Office Department.

This condition of superannuation is rapidly growing worse, and the necessity for legislation to cure the evil is now recognized as being acute.

Because of the low rate of compensation received by postal employees and the constantly increasing cost of living, and because of the standard of living which these employees are expected to observe in their respective communities, they are unable to lay aside a sufficient amount out of their meager earnings to enable them to care for themselves and their dependents in the twilight years of their lives.

We believe that the superannuated employees of the Postal Service could be retired with an annual allowance of not to exceed $600 without imposing any burden on the revenues of the Postal Service.

We urge the department to consider and indorse legislation that will authorize the Postmaster General to grant superannuated classified civil-service employees of the Postal Service an "indefinite leave of absence," together with an allowance of $600 per annum.

We believe that in the great majority of cases it will be found unnecessary to employ anyone in the places of such superannuates as may be granted this "indefinite leave of absence."

Should it be necessary to fill some of these places, substitute or acting employees could be appointed at the rate of compensation now paid to these substitutes or acting employees when performing vacation service; these substitutes or acting employees to be given permanent appointments according to their standing on the eligible list when vacancies occur in the ordinary manner or when the force shall be increased by additional appointments.

We invite attention to some of the more recent recommendations of Postmasters General and Assistant Postmasters General, as contained in the annual reports of the department, in which the necessity for the enactment of legislation for the retirement of superannuated postal employees is recognized and strongly advocated.

In the reports of the Post Office Department for 1910–1911, it will be found that the Postmaster General and the First Assistant Postmaster General both earnestly recommended that Congress enact legislation for the retirement of these superannuated postal employees.

Both of these department officials directed attention to the fact that the employees of the Postal Service, because of the comparatively small salaries received, and because of the conditions of their employment, were generally unable to accumulate sufficient savings to provide for their own support after retirement from the service.

The First Assistant Postmaster General, in the report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, laid particular stress upon the necessity for meeting the condition of superannuation in the service, and offered the practical suggestion that the superannuates could be retired with a sufficient allowance to maintain themselves out of certain funds which accrue to the department each year. In this report the First Assistant Postmaster General suggested that the fund accruing from the lapsed salaries of employees absent without pay because of sickness and so forth, and the very considerable fund which comes to the department each year because of money orders remaining unpaid, would be more than sufficient to meet any cost that might be involved through the retirement of the superannuates.

The First Assistant Postmaster General, in his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, discusses the subject of superannuation in the service at some length. In one place he says: "Superannuation is an important problem in properly reorganizing the Post Office Service, and the increasing volume of parcel-post traffic accentuates the need for an early and definite solution." In the same report the First Assistant Postmaster General says further, that, "if the situation is to be changed, Congress only can do it."

Under date of March 4, 1915, the present First Assistant Postmaster General submitted a statement to the Senate of the United States, which was captioned "The Reward of the Superannuate." After reviewing the whole subject of superannuation in this paper, the First Assistant Postmaster General suggests, in conclusion, that "The compulsory contributions of the employees may be made as low as 1 per cent of the monthly salary, which will impose no undue burden upon them. The additional cost, if any, might be met by lapsed money-order funds, proceeds of dead-letter sales, supplemented by a small percentage of the postal surplus. This might have the effect of stimulating economy and efficiency in the service. Such a law should accord to the Postmaster General broad discretionary power, in order that the determination of superannuation might be administrative, and so that the condition of the fund might be considered in approving applications. Able-bodied men of advanced years would thus be retained in the service to the benefit of themselves and of the Government."

Our association submits that these ideas of the First Assistant Postmaster General in the closing paragraph of his paper entitled "The reward of the superannuate," are in conformity with the plan of retirement which our association suggests, namely, the granting of "an indefinite leave of absence" to such employees as are disabled from the discharge of their duties through superannuation. We believe that investigation will disclose that the percentage of cost to the total salary list that would be involved under the "indefinite leave of absence" plan of retirement will be considerably less than 1 per cent, and that the whole cost would be more than met by the use of lapsed-salary funds, lapsed money-order funds, and proceeds of dead-letter sales, without any direct draft on a postal surplus or other postal funds.

PROMOTION.

We petition the department to recommend legislation that will make it possible to promote clerks in first-class post offices above $1,200 and in second-class offices above $1,100.

The overwhelming proportion of the clerks employed in first and second class post offices are now in the $1,100 and $1,200 grades, respectively. They have virtually reached the highest grade that it is possible for them to attain under existing law. We believe that the encouragement of a further promotion should be held out to them, both in the interest of justice and because of the increased efficiency which springs from the definite hope of reward.

The request for this further opportunity for promotion is based not only upon the exacting and expert nature of the duties performed by post-office clerks, but also upon the greatly increased cost of living, which has been so clearly demonstrated in recently published statistics. There is unanimity of opinion that the cost of living has increased 37½ per cent in the last 10 years.

The attention of the department is respectfully invited to the fact that the first salary classification act for post-office clerks, which was enacted in 1889, contained the following paragraph, which applied to first-class post offices:

"Mail clerks, letter distributors, dispatchers, registry, money order, directory, and nixie clerks, nine classes, salary, graded in even hundred dollars, from $600 to not exceeding $1,400 per annum."

Thus it will be seen that 25 years ago Congress recognized the character of service being rendered by these employees and established a $1,400 maximum salary as a just measure of compensation.

The present salary classification act, which was approved March 2, 1907, does not directly provide for any salaries above $1,200 per annum for post-office clerks. However, the Congress which enacted the classification law of March 2, 1907, recognized the necessity and the justice of promoting clerks above $1,200 per annum by creating the designation of "special clerk" in the $1,300 and $1,400 salary grades. Congress in 1907 adopted this designation of "special clerk" because of representation that was made by the United National Association of Post Office Clerks that the annual promotion should be left open above $1,200 per annum for post-office clerks to cover the maximum of $1,400 per annum recognized in the first salary law of 1889.

Congress did not intend that clerks designated as "special clerks" should be confused in any way with the supervisory officers, and our association has continued to protest against efforts that have been made from time to time since 1907 to consider the "special clerk" as in any sense a supervisory officer.

We hope that recommendation will be submitted as a basis for action by Congress that will definitely establish the status of "special clerks" and provide a definite means for promotion of post-office clerks to these grades.

In view of the fact that Congress, as far back as 1889, believed that post-office clerks were entitled to receive a salary of $1,400, we feel entirely justified at the present time, some 27 years later, in asking that legislation be recommended to provide for the promotion of clerks in first-class post offices to $1,500 per annum and in second-class post offices to $1,400 per annum.

Because of the difficulty frequently experienced in properly recruiting the force of post-office clerks from among the most desirable elements, and because of the superior standard of salaries paid in other branches of the Federal service, we feel that in advocating this proposed legislation we are entirely reasonable and acting for the best interest of the Postal Service.

REMOVALS AND REDUCTIONS.

Resolutions adopted by our convention and the debate incident to their adoption disclosed the existence of a widespread feeling on the part of post-office clerks that their rights as classified Federal civil-service employees were not sufficiently safeguarded under the existing conditions covering the removal of postal employees from the service or their reduction in compensation.

We believe that this feeling of dissatisfaction on the part of the employees is not conducive to the development of the highest efficiency.

We believe that employees, when fearful of becoming victims of unjust reductions or removals, are not likely to feel the same degree of loyalty to their superior officers and to the service as when such conditions do not prevail.

We believe that the best interests of the public service will be conserved and the loyalty and faithfulness of the employees will be assured by the establishment of a "trial board" or "court of inquiry," to be composed of employees of the service who might be appointed by the postmaster from among the employees of the particular post office in which the accused may be employed, such trial board or court of inquiry to consist of employees of equal or higher rank than the accused.

We believe that investigation will develop the information that the public has generally indorsed the idea of a "trial board" whose function it is to investigate and pass judgment upon public employees against whom charges may be preferred.

The interest of the public arises from the desire to promote the merit system in public employment and to establish confidence in the theory of popular government.

We believe that it will be found that, where civil-service employees are engaged in large numbers, either by the different States or by municipalities, there exist trial boards whose duties are to see that discipline is maintained, efficiency increased, and existing laws for the protection of employees properly interpreted, by judiciously and fairly hearing both sides of cases in which the removal or the reduction of an employee is involved. The existence of such boards gives the public confidence in the public service. The right of the employee to face his accuser and to be absolutely sure that he has had an opportunity to know the exact nature of all of the charges that may rest against him removes in a large degree the friction that might otherwise prevail between the employees and the executives.

The attention of the department is invited to the proposed "model civil-service law," embodying the essential principles of a "practical merit system of public employment," as prepared by a committee of the National Assembly of Civil Service Commissions, in cooperation with the National Civil Service Reform League.

This proposed "model law" provides that no employee shall be reduced in compensation or dismissed from the service except upon written charges and after having an opportunity to be heard by a commission in his own defense.

The civil-service laws and regulations of some States and municipalities accord to the employee under charges not only the right to face his accuser, but also to be represented by counsel if so desired.

We believe that careful investigation will disclose the fact that no embarrassment will come to the executive force in maintaining discipline through the operation of a properly created trial-board system.

Thus believing, we urge the department to recommend the creation of such trial boards or courts of inquiry.

THE M'GILLICUDDY COMPENSATION BILL.

Our convention heartily indorsed the bill H. R. 15222, as introduced in the last Congress, "to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries or occupational diseases in the course of their employment." This bill was introduced by Representative DANIEL J. MCGILLICUDDY, of Maine, and favorably reported from the Committee on the Judiciary on April 21, 1914. We hope that the bill will again be introduced, and that it will receive the formal approval of the Post Office Department.

Briefly stated, the McGillicuddy bill provides that in the event of total disability the employee thus disabled shall receive 66⅔ per cent of his monthly pay during the entire period of disability, this sum not to exceed $66.67 per month and not less than $33.33 per month. For partial disability the bill provides for the payment of 66⅔ per cent of the difference between the monthly pay at the time of the injury and the amount of wages that the partially disabled employee is thereafter capable of earning, in no case to exceed $66.67 per month. It is provided that medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies be furnished for a reasonable time and in a reasonable amount.

In the event of death resulting from such injury, it is provided that the widow, if childless, shall receive 35 per cent of the monthly pay of the deceased employee until her death or marriage. It provides that a widow, if there is a child, shall receive the above amount and, in addition, 10 per cent for each child, the total not to exceed 66⅔ per cent of the monthly pay of the deceased. The bill also provides that dependent parents shall receive from 25 per cent to 40 per cent of the monthly compensation, to be determined by the degree of dependency. The bill also provides for compensation to brothers, sisters, grandparents, and grandchildren, ranging from 20 per cent to 30 per cent, according to the degree of dependency. The bill provides that compensation to parents, brothers, sisters, and grandparents shall be paid for a period not exceeding eight years. The bill also provides that for the purpose of the law no salary shall be considered as in excess of $100 nor less than $50 per month. It is further provided that the burial expenses up to the sum of $100 shall be provided. The bill provides for the appropriation of a small sum, which it is believed will be sufficient to meet all the demands during the first year of the operation of the law. It is also provided that the law shall be administered by a commission of three, to be appointed by the President of the United States, subject to the approval of the Senate.

In the recently enacted Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1914, there is embodied the Reilly compensation bill. The Reilly compensation bill applies only to post-office employees, and provides that in the event of injury sustained in the course of employment the employees shall receive full pay for one year and then half the pay for another year, if the disability continues that long. The Reilly compensation bill also provides that in the event of death of an employee, due to injury sustained in the service, those dependent upon him shall receive the lump sum of $2,000.

Thus it will be seen that the Reilly compensation bill is what might be termed a "limited compensation bill," in that it only covers a period of two years.

ASSISTANT POSTMASTERS.

Our convention adopted a resolution favoring the retention of assistant postmasters.

Many of the present assistant postmasters have risen from the ranks of the employees. We believe this avenue of promotion should be kept open to postal employees as an incentive to increased efficiency.

Postmaster General Burleson testified to the worth of the assistant postmasters in his hearing before the Senate Post Office Committee on August 18, 1914. He said in part upon that occasion: "The assistants are the real heads, in a large measure, of the postal affairs of the particular offices in which they serve."

In second-class post offices existing law provides for 1,060 assistant postmasters at salaries of $1,200, $1,300, and $1,400. To abolish the position of assistant postmaster would unnecessarily cause the reduction of these employees to the ranks of the $1,100 maximum clerk grade as now recognized in second-class post offices. Current law also provides for 1,055 assistant postmasters, at salaries of $1,100 and less.

We believe that the position of assistant postmaster in second-class post offices is very essential to the public service, in view of the fact that there are no other designated supervisory officers in offices of this class.

We believe that all vacancies in the position of assistant postmaster should be filled by competitive examination, which should be restricted to the employees of the office where such vacancy exists.

THE CLASSIFIED CIVIL SERVICE.

We heartily indorse the sentiment expressed in the last annual report of the Postmaster General that all postmasters should be brought within the classified civil service.

The specific recommendation that postmasters of the third class be hereafter appointed by the Postmaster General is looked upon as a step in the right direction, and should this legislation be enacted it will enable the Postmaster General to transfer clerks who are now employed in first and second class post offices to these positions. The training of the clerks so transferred would enable them to administer the affairs of such an office with great satisfaction to the public.

VACATIONS.

Under existing law, enacted in 1890, vacations of post-office clerks are limited to 15 days in each year.

There is no further provision of law which would make it possible for clerks to be absent with pay during periods of illness.

The department for a number of years has consistently recommended to Congress that the vacations of post-office clerks be extended to 30 days.

If such legislation, granting the 30-day vacation, were enacted it would, in a large measure, compensate the clerks when compelled to be absent from duty through illness.

It is a well-known fact that all of the employees of the department service in Washington receive not only a 30-day vacation in each year, but are also entitled to as many as 30 days' additional leave in the event of illness.

There seems to be no good reason why there should be this discrimination as between employees of the Government.

Our convention also requests that legislation be enacted to change the present clerks' vacation law so that it will conform to the existing vacation law for letter carriers, which was enacted in 1884.

The clerks' vacation law provides that no vacation can be granted until after one full year of service. There is no such provision in the letter carriers' law, and as a result of the absence of this provision the department has been enabled to pro rate the vacations of newly appointed carriers on the basis of one and one-fourth days for each month of service.

There is much confusion because of the different ways in which different postmasters construe the existing vacation law for clerks. Some few years ago the First Assistant Postmaster General promulgated an official construction of the clerks' vacation law, to the effect that a clerk should receive a vacation of 15 days some time prior to June 30 next following the date on which he completed his first year of regular service. This interpretation further provided that the clerk was to receive another vacation on account of the fiscal year he was beginning on the following day of July 1 at some time during the vacation period commencing with that particular 1st of July.

As the clerks' vacation law is now being generally interpreted, postmasters are compelling new clerks in the service to work as much as 18 and 20 months before granting any vacation.

Our association would like an interpretation from the department of the vacation law that will make it clear to postmasters that they must grant clerks an annual vacation of 15 days within a period of 12 months.

SALARIES OF SUPERVISORY EMPLOYEES.

Our association heartily indorses the effort now being put forth to secure the enactment of legislation that will reclassify the salaries of the supervisory officers employed in the first and second class post offices of the country upon a more equitable and just basis.

It has long been recognized that these supervisory officers are very inadequately compensated in view of the nature of the responsible duties they are discharging.

The mere fact that there are only about 1,000 employees out of the vast army employed in the first and second class post offices who are receiving a compensation in excess of $1,400 per annum speaks volumes for the necessity of additional promotions.

We believe that the efficiency of the service will be greatly advanced through the medium of such proposed promotions.

SUNDAY CLOSING LAW.

Our convention adopted a resolution urging the department to issue a general order to all postmasters to confine Sunday work in post offices within the intent of the "Mann Sunday post-office closing law."

This law reads in part as follows: "That hereafter post offices of the first and second class shall not be open on Sunday for the delivery of mail to the general public."

It has come to our notice that in many post offices practically the same service is being given to the general public on Sundays as prevailed before the Sunday closing law was enacted. This violation of the letter and spirit of the law results in exacting much more Sunday work from the clerks than the law intends. The department is reminded that all unnecessary Sunday work is costly because of the compensatory time which must be given to the clerks on one of the six working days next following.

We believe that there should be the greatest possible uniformity of practice throughout the country in the administration of the Sunday closing law.

TO RAISE THE STANDARD OF POST-OFFICE CLERKS—ENTRANCE EXAMINATIONS.

Our convention unanimously adopted a resolution petitioning the Postmaster General to recommend to the United States Civil Service Commission that the entrance examination for post-office clerks be raised to the same grade as for the departmental service and for the Railway Mail Service.

We deplore the present tendency of the Civil Service Commission to eliminate from the clerks' examination certain subjects that have heretofore been held as essential.

It is the desire of our association that the entrance examination for clerks be raised so that they may be eligible for transfer and promotion to the departmental or Railway Mail Service without further examination.

TRANSFER TO RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

In view of the fact that it has been held unlawful to transfer any employee to the Railway Mail Service at a higher salary than $900 per annum, we urge the Postmaster General to renew his recommendation made to the last session of Congress that legislation be enacted to permit employees of post offices to be transferred to the Railway Mail Service with their attained salaries.

PAY OF SUBSTITUTE AND AUXILIARY EMPLOYEES.

Under existing law substitute clerks and carriers are paid at the rate of 40 cents per hour when working for regular employees who are absent without pay. Existing law also provides that all other substitute, temporary, and auxiliary service shall be paid for at the rate of 35 cents per hour.

A recent Post Office appropriation act was pending in the Senate when an amendment was adopted to pay all substitutes, temporary and auxiliary clerks and carriers at the flat rate of 40 cents per hour. This amendment was reduced to 35 cents per hour when the appropriation bill was in conference.

Our convention adopted a resolution petitioning for the enactment of further legislation to increase the 35-cent rate to 40 cents, thus making a uniform compensation for this class of employees.

In view of the long periods of time that substitute employees must serve without any fixed compensation, we believe the flat rate of 40 cents per hour for all substitute, temporary, and auxiliary service is only just and equitable.

We also petition the department to order that all permanent appointments of substitutes be made at the beginning of a quarter, so that they may be promoted after one year's service as the law contemplates.

TEMPORARY CLERKS.

Our convention adopted a resolution requesting the department to discontinue the practice of making so-called temporary appointments of clerks.

It is pointed out that employees working under this designation receive a compensation of $800 per annum, which is less than they would receive under the rate of 35 cents per hour, which the law authorizes for auxiliary employees. It is also pointed out that employees receiving these temporary appointments suffer injustice because their permanent appointment is indefinitely delayed.

The department is further requested to make clear the status of these employees under the existing vacation and promotion laws which govern regular appointments. There is much doubt as to whether or not clerks temporarily appointed are entitled to the benefits of the vacation law and whether or not the time served during temporary appointment will be taken into consideration after permanent appointment when it comes to consideration for promotion under the provisions of the salary-classification act.

NIGHT WORK IN POST OFFICES.

Our association respectfully petitions the department to issue an order authorizing the postmasters to recognize seven hours of night work as the equivalent of eight hours of daywork. This principle has long been recognized in the English postal service.

A very large percentage of post-office clerks are compelled to labor at night. This night work constitutes the most discouraging feature of clerical employment in post offices. We believe that night work, more than any other one factor, discourages desirable applicants from entering and remaining in the Postal Service. We recognize that some night work is absolutely necessary.

The department is urged to issue a uniform order to all postmasters, instructing them to assign all new appointees to night work, and that all future assignments to positions involving day employment be made from the ranks of the clerks doing night work, such assignment to be on the basis of seniority service, regardless of the division in which employed. We also urge that whenever the senior night clerk is passed over for promotion to daywork he should be notified in writing of the reason.

The department is further urged to issue necessary orders to reduce the amount of night work to a minimum, and in our opinion this could be accomplished without detriment to the service by permitting certain mail matter other than first-class mail and daily newspapers to lay over at night and be worked during the following day.

We heartily commend the propaganda of the department to induce patrons of the mails to deposit all classes of mail matter as early in the day as possible. We pledge our earnest cooperation in this work of educating the public. The practice of holding mail matter until late in the evening greatly retards the delivery of this mail matter, and incidentally works a great hardship to post-office clerks by compelling so many of them to be on duty at night.

SCHEME STUDY.

The department is urged to investigate the general conditions surrounding the "scheme" examinations of all distributing clerks.

Some plan should be devised to allow the clerks who must constantly study time off duty for the purpose of this studying.

A committee of delegates attending our convention, who are engaged in the work of distribution, urge, as a basis for the consideration of the department, that 30 hours of compensatory time be allowed for review work and 60 hours of compensatory time be allowed for the study of new schemes, and that an advance notice of 30 days be given distributers prior to the date of examinations, and at least 90 days be allowed distributers for study of new schemes.

The department is also urged to consider the justice of relieving from further scheme study and examination distributers who have been constantly engaged in the work of distribution for 20 years or more.

Our convention entered a vigorous protest against the practice prevailing in some of the metropolitan post offices whereby qualified distributers on heavy mailing-division schemes have been compelled to also study and learn extensive schemes of city distribution.

Our convention also protests against the practice which still prevails in some large post offices whereby clerks in the mailing division are compelled to learn two or three heavy schemes, whereas they are never called upon to distribute on more than one scheme. It is the experience of distributers that it is very difficult to retain knowledge of schemes on which the clerk is not actively engaged.

Our convention also voted to petition the department that the actual scheme examination of the clerks should be held during the period of regular employment of the clerk. It is particularly an injustice to clerks employed at night to be compelled to come to the office during the day on their own time for the purpose of putting up their examinations.

On the petition of delegates from the second class and smaller first-class offices our convention adopted a resolution protesting against unnecessary scheme study in these smaller offices.

It is a well-known fact that in smaller offices the clerks at different times are employed in all branches of post-office work. In the very small offices there is never a sufficient volume of mail matter to keep a clerk constantly employed in the work of distribution.

These clerks protest that it is an unnecessary hardship to be compelled to learn the same schemes of distribution that are used by railway mail clerks. The railway mail clerks are constantly engaged in the work of distribution and are allowed time off to study their schemes. The scheme knowledge required of these clerks is of no practical use, because it is absolutely impossible to throw the scheme as learned in actual distribution.

It is contended that the efficiency of the service could be thoroughly preserved if an arrangement will be worked out to examine these mailing clerks in the very small offices only on such scheme knowledge as is necessary to properly distribute the mail from the standpoint of the particular office.

In the report of the First Assistant Postmaster General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, the First Assistant Postmaster General said: "Steps have been taken to have examinations given on standpoint rather than on general 'schemes'; that is, to have each clerk learn only the distribution that is proper for his own office."

In view of the fact that some mailing clerks in small offices have suffered loss of promotion because of failure to accomplish the same average as a railway-mail clerk on a Railway Mail Service examination the department is urged to order future examinations of mailing clerks to be held only on the basis of knowledge necessary for the proper distribution of mail being dispatched from that particular office.

EFFICIENCY RECORDS.

The subject of efficiency records received considerable attention from the delegates attending our convention.

It is understood that the department has a commission at work revising the existing efficiency system. There was protest on the part of the delegates attending the convention that too much weight is being given to the element of "speed tests" covering short periods.

We beg to direct the attention of the department to the experience of the Railway Mail Service with the so-called speed tests. The dissatisfaction of the employees because of its introduction in the Railway Mail Service is a matter of history. That the so-called speed system is not practical and does not make for increased efficiency was acknowledged when the Second Assistant Postmaster General, upon the advice and recommendation of the 15 division superintendents of the Railway Mail Service, definitely abandoned the speed tests.

We hope that the experience of the Railway Mail Service will prove sufficient to prevent further attempts to introduce this obnoxious system into our post offices.

The attention of the department is invited to the fact that in a number of post offices local efficiency systems have been put into effect which are wholly and completely at variance with the recognized system which the department promulgated in 1908. In some of these offices where local systems have been adopted they have been based almost entirely upon the taking of speed tests.

We earnestly petition the department to issue an order to all postmasters that these local systems of efficiency must be abandoned pending the time that the department is prepared to promulgate the new system of efficiency upon which it has been at work for some time.

If the practice of establishing local efficiency systems is permitted to grow, chaos in the service must be the natural result.

The attention of the department is invited to the fact that Congress last year adopted amendments to both the Navy and the Army appropriation bills specifically prohibiting the use of a stop watch or other time-measuring device in connection with efficiency systems. It is reasonable to suppose that the will of Congress, as registered in connection with the employees of the Army and Navy Departments, is exactly the same as it would be toward the conditions of employment of post-office employees.

Our association earnestly hopes that before the new rules are definitely promulgated representatives of our association will be given an opportunity to see the same and to offer suggestions based on the actual experience of the employees.

The fact was developed at our convention that under existing conditions some postmasters do not give to their clerks their efficiency ratings twice a year, as is provided for in the present rules. It is also true that some postmasters do not notify their clerks of the imposition of demerits at the time the supposed errors are committed. The department will readily understand how advantage can be taken of the employee when promotion time arrives if the employee has been kept in ignorance of his rating and the number of demerits with which he has been charged.

Considerable complaint was voiced by the clerks because they are not advised when additions to the efficiency system lists of penalties are made. The clerks complained that under these circumstances they do not know how to avoid infractions of some of the new rules. Our convention expressed the belief that the absence of a uniform system in the matter of initial rating for quantity of work performed is the cause of the greatest discontent, discouragement, and misunderstanding. It is the opinion of our association, based upon the experience of many clerks in many offices, that the initial rating for all clerks must be uniform if injustice and discriminations are to be avoided. We believe that the demerits which are charged against the initial rating will sufficiently indicate the relative efficiency and faithfulness of the clerks. We believe that it is wrong in principle to disregard the elements of seniority of service in making up efficiency records.

The principle of seniority of service is generally recognized by employers, particularly where large numbers of workers are concerned. Where consideration is not given to the element of seniority of service, discrimination and favoritism are bound to prevail, at least in the proportion in which seniority is not recognized. Recently enacted civil-service laws and recently adopted civil-service regulations of States and municipalities specifically recognize the necessity of attaching considerable weight to the element of seniority of service when promotion in salary or change to preferred assignment may be under consideration. Seniority is too closely identified with faithfulness to make it safe to disregard it.

We believe that, all other things being equal, sufficient weight should be added for the element of seniority of service to insure the promotion of the clerks with most years of service.

The department is also urged to include in the new efficiency system a definite and uniform method of making promotions to the supervisory positions. Our association suggests that, when possible, vacancies in the higher grades of supervisory positions be filled by promotion from the next lower grade of supervisory officers, and the resultant vacancy in the lowest grade of supervisory positions be filled from the ranks of special clerks and clerks and carriers of the $1,200 grade in first-class offices, and from the ranks of clerks and carriers of the $1,100 grade in second-class offices, after an examination has been held to test ability and fitness, the postmaster to have the right to make a selection from among the three highest passing the examination.

We believe that wherever possible all vacancies in supervisory positions should be filled by promotion from the ranks of the employees in the city in which the vacancy exists. The practice of transferring employees from other cities over the heads of the men expecting promotion in an office is certainly demoralizing.

The department is requested to define the period of time that demerits for violations of the efficiency system shall stand against the record of a clerk. The efficiency record system is silent on this point, with the result that some postmasters hold demerits against a clerk's record from year to year, thus permitting such an accumulation of errors as to not only prevent the clerk's promotion but also to place his position in peril.

SANITATION.

Our convention adopted a resolution urging the department to renew the campaign for better sanitary conditions in post offices, which was inaugurated some few years ago under the administration of Postmaster General Cortelyou.

The department is urged to again direct the attention of all postmasters to the necessity of enforcing the sanitary rules which were incorporated in the order of former Postmaster General Cortelyou. We ask consideration for the advantage of substituting vacuum cleaning for the present system of dry sweeping and cleaning, which is so dangerous to health.

The attention of the department is again invited to the condition of the sacks used in the transportation of mail matter. These sacks, by virtue of being thrown upon and dragged over many dirty floors and railway platforms, accumulate great quantities of dust and disease germs. When these sacks are emptied in the post office the atmosphere becomes laden with this dust and these germs, seriously menacing the health of the employees.

It is generally believed that much of the tuberculosis contracted by post-office clerks is traceable to this cause.

It is suggested to the department that these sacks could be treated with a powerful disinfectant and subjected to some cleansing process at least once a year without great cost to the department.

That the dust-laden atmosphere of the distributing rooms in post offices and general insanitary conditions are conducive to the spread of tuberculosis is attested by a recent investigation of the postal service of France. A report makes public the result of this investigation, reading as follows:

"According to statistics just published the French postal employees pay a terribly heavy death tribute to tuberculosis. Prof. Landouzy has shown that of 100 deaths of postal employees in 1902, 15 were due to tuberculosis. In 1903 the percentage rose to 17, in 1904 to 21, and it is estimated to-day at over 30. It is stated that the scourge is spreading rapidly owing to the lack of air in the post offices and to the fact that the offices are scarcely ever cleaned out properly on account of the nonprovision of funds to pay cleaners."

In view of the fact that tuberculosis in post offices has become something of an occupational disease, our association believes that these victims of the white plague should be accorded free entry and treatment in the hospitals conducted under the auspices of the Marine Hospital Service of the United States.

STOOLS OR SEATS FOR DISTRIBUTORS.

Our convention again adopted a resolution earnestly requesting the department to furnish stools or some other form of seat for the use of clerks who are constantly engaged in the work of distribution. The work of a distributor, particularly those employed in the very largest offices, is very confining in its nature. He is compelled to stand in practically one position all day, or all night, and this constitutes a severe physical strain, which results in a useless and unnecessary waste of energy. Many of our distributors suffer from broken arches of the feet and from varicose veins as a result of this constant standing. An occasional opportunity to sit down would be of great physical benefit to the clerks. A number of kinds of seats have been suggested which the clerks think could be installed and which would not take up any room and would be inexpensive to the department.

Stools are now in use by distributors in some of our post offices, and where installed have proven to be of great benefit to the men.

SATURDAY HALF HOLIDAYS.

In some of our States the Saturday half holiday has been made legal by act of the legislature.

In many of the departments of the Government service the employees now enjoy the privilege of the Saturday half holiday.

In the business world the recognition of the Saturday half holiday has become almost universal.

In some departments and divisions in first and second class post offices certain of the employees are now permitted to enjoy Saturday afternoons off duty.

We earnestly petition the department to extend this privilege to the employees of other divisions and departments of first and second class post offices who do not now enjoy the privilege.

We believe it is only fair that the employees of divisions where the nature of the work is such that it is impossible to give the employees a Saturday half holiday, should be given a half holiday on some other day of the week in order that there may be no discrimination in the treatment of employees of various divisions.

We believe that the privilege of the Saturday half holiday could safely be extended to many employees of city post offices who do not now enjoy it. It is a well-known fact that, because of the general suspension of business on Saturday afternoons, the volume of mails falls off very materially on Saturday afternoons.

EXTENDING THE TIME OF LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The present practice of limiting the leave of absence that may be given to a clerk to five months very frequently works a hardship in the case of a faithful clerk who has been employeed in the service for years, and who may be stricken with a malady that may require a longer period than five months for recuperation. We believe that the worry occasioned to the afflicted clerk because of being dropped from the service at the end of five months seriously militates against recovery of health.

We therefore ask that the limit of a leave of absence be extended to one year before the clerk is compelled to resign, and that the clerk be eligible for a reinstatement within the following year at his salary at the time of resignation.

COMPENSATORY TIME FOR HOLIDAY WORK.

Our convention adopted a resolution requesting the department to instruct postmasters that clerks should be granted compensatory time off duty for all necessary work performed on certain recognized holidays.

There are certain divisions in all post offices where no holiday work is required, and it is only simple justice to the clerks working in divisions where holiday work is required that they be given time off for the same.

FORWARDING SHORT-PAID MAIL MATTER.

Our convention indorsed the proposed legislation to authorize the Postmaster General to forward to destination all mail matter not prepaid or insufficiently prepaid, double the amount of the unpaid postage to be collected on delivery.

REQUESTING DEFINITIONS OF "IDENTIFICATION."

Our convention adopted a resolution requesting the department to issue a statement for the benefit of money-order and registry clerks by way of explaining what constitutes proper "identification" in the payment of money orders and in the delivery of registered matter.

We believe that greater protection would be afforded to paying tellers if a space were definitely provided on the back of money-order forms for the signature of persons making identification of others.

Money-order clerks are frequently compelled to stand losses arising through the wrong payment of money orders, notwithstanding that every precaution had been taken to establish "identification" as locally construed. If the department would establish a universal system of identification many of these losses, which the clerks are now compelled to bear, might not happen.

It was suggested that the department should have a fund with which to indemnify money-order clerks who have been compelled to bear these losses, if, upon investigation, it is established that every proper precaution was exercised by the clerk before payment was made.

"OUTLOOK" OR "WINDOW" ENVELOPES.

The department is urged to issue an order denying entry to the mail of the so-called "outlook" or "window" envelopes. These envelopes have an open space which is covered with glazed paper, through which the address must be read. The strain on the eyes of the distributing clerks is greatly increased because of attempting to read addresses through this glazed paper.

Because of the careless insertion of invoices and statements in these envelopes, it is frequently impossible to read the addresses at all.

It has been demonstrated that the distribution of this class of mail matter is a much slower process than the distribution of any other class of mail matter.

In view of the campaign now being conducted by the department to lessen the expense incident to the vast amount of work performed in the different directory divisions of the city post offices, it is suggested that a material saving would be accomplished if these "outlook" envelopes were debarred from the mails.

It is also suggested that if the department will not prohibit entry to the mails of these so-called "outlook" envelopes an order be issued to do away with the glazed insert over the so-called "window."

SALE OF STAMPS AND CARDS.

The department is also respectfully requested to consider the advisability of resuming the former practice of packing postal cards in packages of 25.

The department is also requested to devise a method of printing special stamp editions of a memorial nature in sheets of 50 and 100, in order to facilitate the handling and sale of the same.

The attention of the department is invited to complaints constantly being made to stamp clerks by the public about the poor perforation of stamps.

PROPER ADDRESSING OF PUBLICATIONS.

The department is urged to enforce paragraph 3, section 465, Postal Laws and Regulations, 1913, requesting that printed addresses on publications be in clear type, not smaller than long primer.

The department is also urged to request publishers to print either on the cover page of all publications or on the wrapper thereof the name of the publication, with the office of issue and frequency of issue. This will greatly expedite the work of notifying publishers of changes of addresses, etc.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE ERROR CHECKS.

The department is respectfully requested to instruct the proper officials of the Railway Mail Service to forward daily all slips on which are noted errors in the distribution of mail.

The practice is to hold these error slips, with the result that clerks in post offices continue to make what may prove to be a mechanical error over and over again.

TEMPORARY SALARY REDUCTIONS.

Our convention urges the department to change the present ruling concerning the reduction in salary of clerks for specific offenses and breaches of discipline.

When a clerk has been reduced in salary for one quarter, and when the reduction in salary is at the rate of $100 per annum, it is believed that ordinarily the clerk has been sufficiently fined or disciplined for that particular offense. But under existing interpretation of the law the clerk can not be promoted until one year after the time he has been restored to his former salary. This results in the clerk suffering a double, and sometimes a triple, penalty for the same offense. The department is urged to change this ruling and allow clerks who have been temporarily reduced in salary for a specific offense to be promoted in their regular order after one year of service in their grade, time in the grade prior to the temporary reduction to be computed in making up the year of service in the grade as well as time in the grade after salary was restored.

WITHHOLDING PAY FOR SUNDAY.

Under a ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury an employee who is compelled for any cause to be absent from duty on Saturday and again on the following Monday must sacrifice a day's pay for the intervening Sunday, whether the employee was scheduled to work on that Sunday or not.

This regulation is very obnoxious to the post-office clerks and generally regarded as very unjust. In some branches of the service Sunday work is not required at all, and it seems absurd to deduct from an employee's salary a day's pay for Sunday because the employee happened to be away on Saturday and Monday.

Congress has recently enacted legislation that post-office clerks and carriers shall receive compensatory time off duty on some week day for all Sunday work, thus indicating a legal intent that post-office clerks and carriers are supposed to work on the basis of six days per week rather than on the basis of seven days.

The department is urged to recommend legislation that will overcome the effect of this decision of the comptroller

AGAINST 1-CENT LETTER POSTAGE.

Our convention unanimously went on record as opposing the proposed legislation to reduce the rate on letter postage to 1 cent. We believe that the effort to secure such proposed legislation is premature.

TO REMOVE LIMITS ON POSTAL SAVINGS.

Our convention adopted a resolution suggesting to the department that legislation be recommended to remove all limitation on the amount of money that may be deposited by a depositor in the postal savings bank.

We believe patrons should be able to transfer savings accounts without withdrawing same.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

We believe that each department of the Government should bear its share of the cost of the transportation and handling of its mail by the Post Office Department.

We further believe that the Post Office Department should receive at least a book credit for the great tonnage of free congressional matter that is constantly being handled by the Post Office Department without credit of any description.

BALING MACHINES FOR WASTE PAPER.

It has come to our knowledge that the department has installed in some post offices baling machines to take care of all waste paper and suitably prepare it for sale.

We believe that the department would be justified in placing these machines in almost every first and second class post office in the country, feeling that the revenue derived from the sale of the waste paper would soon reach very considerable proportions.

TERMINAL STATIONS.

Our convention adopted a resolution respectfully requesting the Postmaster General to issue an order transferring all clerks employed in the new railway terminal offices to the jurisdiction of the postmaster in the city where the terminal station is located.

We believe that if these terminal post offices were manned by clerks from the city post office and under the jurisdiction and control of the local postmaster the efficiency of the service would be increased and a greater economy effected.

PARCEL POST.

We urge the department to consider the advisability of requesting the public to write on the wrappers of parcels requiring special handling the exact contents of the parcel. Experience demonstrates that the public now frequently confuse the terms "fragile" and "perishable."

We urge the department to consider the advisability of charging an extra fee on all "fragile" parcel-post matter, so as to prevent the very extensive practice of the public in wrongfully and knowingly marking ordinary parcel-post matter as "fragile."

We also believe that short-paid "perishable" parcels should be sent through to destination, the amount of short postage to be collected on delivery.

The department is urged to hasten the day when proper and suitable equipment will be furnished for handling the parcel post.

Respectfully submitted.

[By unanimous consent, Mr. GRIFFIN and Mr. RODENBERG were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR].

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I realize that a great amount of thought and labor has been devoted to the preparation of the pending Post Office appropriation bill, and, knowing this, I do not feel justified in taking up the time of the committee by speaking at great length upon the various important features connected with this measure. I do wish to state, however, that, unusually busy as I happen to be at the present time, I have tried to find time to familiarize myself with the different sections incorporated in this bill, and I especially wish to congratulate the chairman and his colleagues on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for the very excellent measure they have been able to formulate in the face of so many trying difficulties.

It is no little matter, Mr. Chairman, to prepare any appropriation bill so that later it will meet with reasonable satisfaction. When we are reminded that the pending measure, providing for the maintenance of a Postal Service for the ensuing year, carries with it an appropriation of over $320,000,000, provides for a service that enters most intimately into the life of every citizen of our common country and, at the same time, sets a rate of wages and fixes a standard of employment for approximately a quarter of a million postal employees, we can more fully appreciate the magnitude of the measure we are considering. From every point of view I think the committee has done very well indeed, and I say this in the face of the fact that I favor certain other liberal provisions affecting the Postal Service that are not incorporated in this bill.

To successfully administer the affairs of the great Post Office Department, three principles should be continually kept in view. Above all, the service should be efficient, the cost of the service should be reasonable, and the general well-being of the employees should be wisely protected. In this bill I think the committee has kept these ideas well in mind.

No more tangled or intricate problem could come before a body for consideration than the question of railway mail pay. Desiring to be, on the one hand, fair to the railroads and, on the other, alive to the interests of the people, the present plan contained in this bill to reimburse railways for transporting the mail seems to be designed with this very end in view.

In this bill also is incorporated a provision to permit the bonding of the postal employees by the Post Office Department. To escape the exactions of private surety companies who insist on charging the employees of the Post Office Department an unreasonable rate for this class of service, this bill provides that the department may bond its own employees at a rate which shall not exceed 75 per cent of the present cost for such bonds. This is an excellent measure, and I hope it will be adopted by this House.

In this bill $53,000,000 are appropriated for the maintenance of the Rural Free Delivery Service for the ensuing year. This is $4,000,000 in excess of the amount asked for by the Post Office Department to carry on this branch of the Postal Service. No more important service of any kind exists to-day than the Rural Free Delivery Service, both to the patrons on the route and the people in general. I am firmly opposed to making any change in the Rural Free Delivery Service that would be calculated to lower the efficiency of this important part of the people's business, and I have constantly been heard in this House during my 10-year service in this body advocating good wages and decent treatment on behalf of the rural carriers of the country. During the past year, an effort has been made to motorize the Rural Service. Numerous complaints have arisen as a result of this change, and I submit that the argument of economy should not be alone sufficient to justify this proposed plan. All new departures of this character should be viewed in the light of efficiency as well as economy. Nor should we be insensible to the welfare of a great army of rural carriers in the country. In meeting this problem, this House should take into consideration each of those factors, and if economy is to be secured at the expense of efficient service, then, under such circumstances, I wish to record myself as being against it.

In this bill wider opportunities for promotion in the service are provided for. The beginning, it is true, is small, but it is an encouraging sign. A new grade, designated special clerks, has been created, with salaries ranging as high as fifteen hundred dollars. This provision not only opens up a wider field of promotion for the clerks in the larger offices, but it applies to clerks in offices of the second class as well. This, too, is a good feature of this bill.

In the City Letter Carrier Service numerous changes of a beneficial character, favorably affecting the employees in question, are incorporated in this measure. Substitute letter carriers are now, as they should be, brought within the scope of the present compensation act, which compensates postal employees for injuries received in the performance of duty. In the original draft of the compensation law these employees were excluded. Their rate of pay is fixed at 35 cents an hour for all temporary service instead of a rate approximating 29 cents an hour, which they were in many instances paid.

Then, too, provision is made in this bill for payment of compensatory time of post-office clerks and carriers who are compelled to perform regular service on such holidays as are usually observed. This provision, if it becomes a law, will result in a more general observance of holidays not alone by the post office but upon the part of the people as well. The man who works as steadily as post-office employees are, called upon to work, no matter what may be the type of labor he performs, is entitled to an occasional day of rest and recreation. Public sentiment indorses such a policy and this section of the bill proves that Congress is well abreast of the times in its concern for those who do the work of the world.

During the past two years there has been a disposition on the part of the Post Office Department to make of carriers assigned to the delivery and collection service two separate grades of work, carrying with them a difference of $200 in salary. Provision is made in the pending bill to correct this tendency, and the bill further provides that such collectors as have been reduced in salary should be restored to their former grade. In my opinion no just reason can be assigned why any distinction should be made in payment of salaries of carriers who care for the responsible and trying duties that are a part of the collection service of the post office, and this section can not help but result in being a benefit not only to the men affected but to the service as well.

Viewing the pending bill as a whole, I wish to repeat that I consider it a most excellent measure. The interests of the people are properly protected; and we must not forget that the Postal Service, in its origin, was intended to be a servant of the people. What changes in existing law the pending measure contemplates have but one purpose in view, and that is to make the Postal Service more businesslike and efficient in its administration. Neither has the Post Office Committee been unmindful of the welfare of the employees in the Postal Service. This fact is proven by the number of beneficial measures incorporated in this bill which makes certain changes in the present status of the working condition of post-office employees, and which have been very properly designed to lighten their burden, fix a just standard of compensation for services rendered, and offer wider opportunities for advancement and promotion in the ranks.

There is one matter, however, of which I wish to speak in connection with the payment of salaries of clerks and carriers in post offices of the second class which appeals to me as being rank discrimination. The great majority of Members of this House have post offices of this character in their districts, and, like myself, must be fully acquainted with the facts in the case of which I will speak.

The present classification act fixing the salary of letter carriers was passed on March 2, 1907. With one amendment, which fixes the entrance grade at $800 per annum instead of six hundred, this is the law governing the salaries of clerks and carriers at the present time. I quote from this law:

SECTION 288½, POSTAL LAWS AND REGULATIONS.

After June 30, 1907, clerks in offices of the first and second class and carriers in the City Delivery Service shall be divided into six grades, as follows: First grade, salary, $600; second grade, salary, $800; third grade, salary, $900; fourth grade, salary, $1,000; sixth grade, $1,200. Clerks and carriers at first-class offices shall be promoted successively to the fifth grade, and clerks and carriers at second-class offices shall be promoted successively to the fourth grade.

After June 30, 1907, all promotions of both clerks and carriers shall be made at the beginning of the quarter following the expiration of a year's service in the next lower grade.

I wish to especially direct your attention to the wording of this law. Its opening sentence states—

After June 30, 1907, clerks in offices of the first and second class and carriers in the City Delivery Service shall be divided into six grades.

By the phraseology used in this law one would naturally conclude that it was the intent of Congress to not only divide the clerk and carrier service into certain grades, where promotion would be made annually upon proof of satisfactory service on the part of the employees, but that this promotion would also be open to the highest grade for all clerks and carriers, no matter in what office they might be stationed. No other conclusion can be reached by careful study of this law.

As a matter of fact, however, while clerks and carriers, stationed in offices of the first class, have automatically reached the sixth grade as contemplated in the provisions of this law, post-office clerks and carriers, doing the same sort of work in offices of the second class, have been unable to advance beyond the fifth grade. Thus the maximum salary to be attained in first-class offices of clerk and carrier is twelve hundred dollars while in the smaller offices it is eleven hundred dollars. I am unable to reason out any justice or necessity for this discrimination. In both instances the work to be performed is the same, the discipline, under which these men serve, is similar in character, and all other provisions of the Postal Rules and Regulations apply with equal force to all clerks and carriers, no matter what the class of office. Moreover, innumerable instances exist in which the territory served by carriers in first and second class offices is but divided by a single street.

I submit that these employees are a faithful, loyal, and reliable set of men. They do their work well. They are a picked set of men held in high esteem by the people they serve, and much of the present popularity of the Postal Service with the public can be traced to the efficient and courteous manner in which these men discharge their duties in all wind and weather. Joining hand with them, the clerks and carriers in the larger offices are just as anxious to have this discrimination removed as are their brethern in the second-class offices, and time after time have passed resolutions recommending that this be done.

As I pointed out before, there is no need of additional law to be passed by Congress which will provide for the promotion of these employees to the highest grade. That is already provided for in the present law. All that is necessary to be done to insure the advancement of these men to the maximum grade is for Congress to vitalize the present law by making an appropriation—which in itself will not be large—that will permit these clerks and carriers employed in post offices of the second class to be promoted to the maximum grade. Such appropriation ought to be made, and I trust it will be made. Familiar as the Members of this House are with the accuracy of the statements which I herewith submit, and knowing, as I know, how just are the contentions of these men, leads me to hope that this body will incorporate in the pending Post Office appropriation bill, which I so heartily indorse, an added provision which will permit simple justice being done to this deserving set of employees.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS].

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I will avail myself of this opportunity to speak on the subject of "preparedness." During the last year I have believed that the complications daily arising out of the European war require that we should increase our armament and maintain ourselves in a better state of defense. I have not, however, felt that my own judgment was infallible, but that I needed the counsel and advice of my constituents. In order that I might know the sentiment of my people in the State of Illinois, whom I have the honor to represent in this Congress, I commenced a systematic poll about January 1 and sent out letters to acquaintances in the various counties and congressional districts of the State, requesting them to sound the state of the public mind on this important question and advise me. My letter of inquiry reads as follows:

MY DEAR SIR: I am sending you herewith a copy of the President's message delivered before Congress upon the convening of the present session. This is a very important state paper and I know you will read it with interest. In this message the President deals with some of the great questions now pending solution before the country, and particularly with conditions growing out of the European war. Perhaps the most important question before Congress is that of preparedness for national defense. I am no longer on the Naval Affairs Committee, having been assigned to that of the Judiciary, but I am familiar with the condition of the Navy and have much interest in that subject. I know our Navy should be strengthened along the lines which the lessons of the European war have demonstrated most necessary for defense. I feel that we ought to largely increase the number and quality of our submarines and other auxiliary craft and that we should materially develop aviation, which has become an essential part of the Navy and Army for scout and other purposes. We also need a much better supply of arms and ammunition and other equipment than we now have. All of which will entail expense. I feel sure, however, that if we have a good Navy, sufficient to intercept the enemy at sea and prevent a landing on our shores, that we will not require a great Army. I do not take kindly to the idea of universal military enlistment and drill. Will you please feel out public sentiment along these lines in your community and write me the consensus of opinion as you find it? I assure you it will be a benefit to me in arriving at my conclusion.

The first responses were largely indefinite in tone and indicated that the writers and the people with whom they conferred were not sufficiently informed as to the condition of our Army and Navy and the necessity for strengthening either to enable them to advise me with definiteness and certainty. I observed that as the question became more and more agitated and the people better informed, the assurance of the writers was more clearly evidenced and the replies more certain in tone. These letters indicate to my mind that there is a very rapid growth in public sentiment in favor of better preparedness for defense. Immediately following the Presidents' visit to the West there was a very decided change in the sentiment expressed and it became apparent that the President's words had taken root and that the people of the State of Illinois realize the importance and the necessity of strengthening both arms of our national defense.

I have tabulated these returns from the beginning of my poll down to and including my mail to-day, and I find that 85 per cent of these replies are in favor of the program which the President has outlined, and the writers express a positive conviction for a great Naval Establishment approximately equal to any, and for a material enlargement and strengthening of our land forces. None seem to favor involuntary service in the Army nor compulsory enlistment. The continental army plan meets with outright opposition. A large per cent of the replies indicate a desire that the Regular Army should be increased, and that the National Guard should be materially augmented and rendered more responsive to national authorities. The federalizing of the National Guard seems to meet with favor. I find that 10 per cent of the writers, and those for whom they assume to speak, are in favor of a moderate increase only of the Navy and practically no change in the Army. Five per cent of those who have replied are opposed to any increase of either the Army or the Navy, or to any kind of preparedness, and scout the idea that there is now or will be in the future any need of expenditures along these lines. They seem impressed with the argument that all Europe will be exhausted, bankrupt, and penniless, and that no danger threatens us from any quarter.

If I ever entertained any doubt as to my duty here in relation to this great question, that doubt has been removed by the spirit and the tone of the letters which I have received from my State, and the judgment which I have formed and heretofore entertained has been confirmed by these advices. So I speak to-day in behalf of national preparedness, and stand unequivocally in favor of the enlargement of our Naval and Military Establishments to a point of efficiency adequate for every emergency.

We stand face to face with abnormal conditions. A spirit of war and carnage and death possesses the world. Those of us who dreamed of world peace and the disarmament of nations during the calm that preceded the storm were rudely awakened a year and a half ago to a realization that war is appointed, and constitutes a part of the economy of nature, designed and intended. Human nature is so constituted, individually and collectively, that war is inevitable. The reason why is not a pertinent inquiry; it is enough for us to know that it is true, and knowing this, it is our duty to ourselves and to posterity to prepare our country against attack, that we may hand down to future generations unimpaired the institutions established by our fathers which we in our day and time enjoy in all their integrity.

No good purpose can be served by harrowing the sensibilities of this House and the country with a description of life in the trenches and upon the battle line. We know that human slaughter is the order of the day; that millions of men, armed to the teeth, face each other in the field, and that death and carnage, destitution and misery and want abound. We know that war is contagious and that the scent of blood impels men to desperate deeds. We know that a spark here and another there may ignite in a moment and draw us involuntarily into the flame. Such, I apprehend, are the dangers of the hour. I have an abiding confidence in the wisdom and the integrity of our President. I know his aims, his hopes, and his prayers are for peace. I know that he will sacrifice all save his country's honor to maintain peace. I am hopeful that he may succeed, but at times I almost despair. We may succeed in maintaining peace with honor to the end of this awful struggle, but what then?

It is a mistake to say that all the countries now engaged in war will be brought to the point of utter exhaustion. Somebody is going to win, and somebody will dictate the terms of peace, and when this war is concluded there will remain millions of the best organized, the best disciplined, the best trained, and the best seasoned men who ever bore arms or ever went to battle for a cause, just or unjust. I predict that the navies of the contending powers, without exception, will emerge from this war stronger by odds than when war was declared. England, by means of her navy, has control of the seas, and by reason of the superiority of her naval establishment will likely remain mistress of the seas when peace is declared. I doubt whether the opposing navies will emerge from their shelter and engage the English Navy in battle. I doubt whether the English or the German Navy will suffer impairment from any general engagement. Both countries and all naval powers are increasing their navies in every detail from day to day. It must follow that unless the navies of the contending powers measure their strength and grapple in a final struggle for supremacy that the navies of Europe and also that of Japan will at the close be much stronger than they were at the beginning of the war, and that as a consequence our Navy, unless materially increased, and that soon, will be relegated from third to fifth or sixth place among the navies of the world. The navies of other countries, stimulated by necessity, are being rapidly augmented, while ours remains nominally stationary, with only the usual and ordinary increase in times of peace.

Such, I apprehend, will be the relative naval strength of the world when the European struggle is over and the wider struggle begins for the control of the world's trade and commerce. We must not forget that animosities are engendered, jealousies aroused, enemies multiplied, and that the day of reckoning will come. Some nation or group of nations will have scores to even with us when their hands are loosened. We are fast becoming the richest nation of the world. Our coffers are rapidly filling with the treasure of all the earth. We possess resources and wealth the envy of all nations. We are a tempting prize. If true that other nations will be exhausted, and true that their navies will be superior to ours, may they not seek to reimburse themselves from our stores of wealth?

I know that many people insist that we are inaccessible and invincible, and are immune from foreign attack. We are conscious of our own strength, our vast resources, and the patriotism and devotion of our people. This sense of superiority begets a feeling of security and confidence that may be our undoing. It is argued that it is practically impossible to transport a modern army across the oceans. That depends upon whether the sea is guarded or unguarded. With a good navy to defend against approach, it would be impossible; without such a navy, it is entirely practicable to transport an army of sufficient numbers and equipment to secure a base on our shores, capture our coast cities, and menace the interior. Such an army would be trained, seasoned veterans, and more than a match for several times their number of raw, untrained militia.

But this is not our real danger. If attacked now by a superior naval power our Navy would readily be destroyed or driven to cover, and the experience of Germany in this war is that a navy run to cover, sheltered behind fortifications, is a useless thing. Once our Navy is defeated or has taken refuge, our ports would be blockaded, our coast cities destroyed or immense tribute exacted, our commerce driven from the seas, and trade with neutral nations suspended until the restoration of peace. All of the armies that could be assembled for the defense of New York City, or any other of our coast cities, would be helpless against navies and the long-range guns of the enemy. The mammoth skyscrapers of New York City would be an easy mark for the enemy 20 miles at sea, beyond reach of millions of armed men marshaled on the shore.

The greatest danger confronting us lies in the fact that our people intend to go after the world's trade, and become a real factor in the world's markets, competing with the commercial nations of Europe and Asia. The present war is a commercial war, fought for commercial supremacy. When concluded, the participants, impelled by necessity, will make desperate attempts to reestablish their trade and regain their prestige. There will be a commercial scramble unparalleled. We must either become a hermit nation, deny ourselves commercial intercourse with the world, or be prepared to defend our rights on the high seas and protect our expanding trade in all quarters of the globe. We must surrender our pretensions to a world power or build a merchant marine and send out surplus products to foreign ports. It is manifest that if we do engage in this struggle, if we reach out for trade, if we undertake to compete in the markets of the world, we must have a Navy to compel fear, if not respect, and protect our rights on the high seas. We may write notes and protest against wrongs, but unless behind the message there is might and power our notes are but "scraps of paper." Our experiences in the present crisis, the apparent contempt which other nations have manifested for us, the impotency of our diplomacy, lies in our unpreparedness to compel respect for our demands and to enforce the rights which we assert.

The Monroe doctrine must be maintained inviolate. We have said for a hundred years that monarchs shall not acquire territory and plant their institutions on American soil; that the Western Hemisphere is dedicated to the cause of free men, free government, and free institutions. Some nations have recognized this doctrine, but some have scouted and have even threatened to openly defy it. It is a well-known fact that certain great powers covet a foothold on American shores, and it is believed by all informed men that the day is not far distant when we will be called upon to defend the Monroe doctrine.

It is the recognized and long-established right of neutral countries to supply munitions of war to belligerents. We are exercising this right, and are supplying arms and ammunition to all belligerents with whom we have free intercourse. To deny this right and cut off our trade with all nations accessible to the sea would be an unneutral act, and we would at once be placed in the category of discriminating against those nations that are in a condition to receive, because other nations, for reasons beyond our control and for which we are not at fault, are unable to profit by our intercourse. But there is a greater reason why we should exercise this right. The day may come when we are involved and will need to draw on other nations, and if we would avail ourselves of this established rule of international law we can not refuse like privileges to other nations at this time. As a consequence we would be forced to maintain at enormous expense an immense supply of reserve ammunition to meet remote emergencies or establish, equip, and maintain extensive plants in times of peace of sufficient capacity to immediately supply our needs if suddenly confronted by war.

I favor the Government manufacture, in so far as practical, of all armament, arms, and ammunition and the establishment and equipment of Government plants for that purpose. But I realize that it is manifestly impossible to adequately equip ourselves for every emergency. To this end we must comply with international law, that we may have access to the markets of the world, and while protecting ourselves against extortion by the maintenance of Government plants we ought not discourage or wholly destroy private enterprise engaged in the manufacture of munitions on which we must rely in a measure in case of war.

We have the most extensive coast line in the world. We must defend and protect our rights in two widely separated oceans. The Panama Canal, if utilized, must be defended and our insular possessions in both seas protected. We have conflicting interests in the east and in the west, and we must expect in case of war to be involved with a combination of powers and assailed from both directions. Our duty ought to be plain. We ought to be adequately prepared for the contingencies which will inevitably arise. We should materially enlarge and strengthen our Navy in every feature. Aviation should be developed and our coast defenses and fortifications strengthened. We should have a large supply of ordnance, guns and ammunition and other equipment. To provide the means of defense which will be required if attacked will entail great expense. This is the lone argument advanced by those who are opposed to preparedness. I can not believe that the American people will let the question of cost deter them in the face of danger. The peace of our homes, the integrity of our country, and the honor of our flag are too dear. I am proud to know that on this vital question there is no party division and no party lines, but that we are all Americans. We love our country and are ready to fight to preserve inviolate its integrity, its honor, and its glory. [Applause.]

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

FREE RURAL POST ROUTES.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, nothing has come to the farmers of the Middle West during the last 25 years that has contributed more to their welfare, happiness, and contentment than the establishment and maintenance of the free rural routes. During the past eight months many of the rural routes of the country have been discontinued and changed. Against these changes and discontinuances thousands of protests have been filed by the farmers with the Post Office Department and with individual Congressmen. To argue or to say that these protests are frivolous or not well founded is to reflect upon the intelligence and candor of the entire rural population of the country.

BELATED PROMISES TO INSPECT.

Last Saturday I heard the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads [Mr. MOON] defend, or rather apologize for, the policy of the Postmaster General toward the rural routes of the country. He inserted in the RECORD a letter from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Blakeslee, the first two paragraphs of which are as follows:

It is certain that if given time this department can eliminate every substantial objection to the new methods adopted for the collection and delivery of mail on rural routes.

Representatives of the department are now inspecting and adjusting the revised service in many localities, and will eventually cover all districts where any change has been made.

In the last sentence is an admission of the unwisdom of ordering changes in the routes without inspection. The department evidently, from the storm of protests from every quarter of the country, now realizes its blunder and sees the necessity for inspection, for we are assured by this letter that inspectors "will eventually cover all the districts where any change has been made." Why this letter was placed in the RECORD I am at a loss to fully understand, for an indefinite promise "eventually" to inspect can not prove very reassuring to the aggrieved patrons who reside in the "districts where any change has been made." In the face of all this the chairman of the committee exhorts the Members of this House to "wait and have patience." I wish to state, however, that I hope that the department is sincerely endeavoring to correct its numerous mistakes of the past year.

There were no changes made in the rural routes of the district that I have the honor to represent until last October. The first change was ordered in the southwest portion of Davis County. Most of the rural-route patrons there were served by two carriers out of West Grove. No inspector had been sent over this territory, and the first anybody knew anything about the proposed changes was when 20 or 30 days before the postmaster received notice that one route would be discontinued and the other one extended, the order to go in effect October 15.

Following this order others were issued affecting different parts of my district. The West Grove patrons sent me a petition of protest signed by 128 heads of families, patrons of the two routes. The patrons who did not get to sign this petition wrote me personal letters protesting against the order of the Postmaster General. The protest was unanimous from the patrons of both routes. On October 27 I filed this petition with the Postmaster General, accompanied by a letter written by myself, part of which is as follows:

These changes were made without investigation and report of an inspector as to the feasibility or practicability of such changes; without conferring with any residents of the locality where the changes were made, and without consulting the wishes of the patrons.

The only apparent reason of the department for these changes is to cut down the expenses of the department, and it has been determined to make the farmers suffer first and most, and to deprive them of a much needed and popular service.

The farmer in the Middle West is a business man, and is as much in need of and entitled to his daily mail as is the merchant or manufacturer in the city. The daily market reports are a greater necessity to the average farmer than is any class of mail daily delivered to the retail merchants in our cities and towns.

Iowa stands lowest in the percentage of illiteracy of any State in the Union. There is no illiteracy among Iowa farmers, and they devote more time each day to reading daily papers and magazines and take a keener interest in what they read than does the urban population.

To curtail the Rural Mail Service on the plea that it does not pay for itself is as unfair as it would be to deprive the residents of the outskirts of a city of the free-delivery service because the postal receipts of that portion of the city are not as great as from the business center of the city.

About the only legislation ever passed by the General Government directly for the benefit of the farmers was the establishment of the free rural delivery of mail. Now your department, instead of extending this popular service, is taking it away from a large number of farmers who heretofore have enjoyed its privileges and advantages. Instead of curtailing this service, it should be extended until every farmer has that daily service the same as the city dweller. If not, why not? Why should a resident within the corporate limits of a city be any more entitled to consideration and service from the General Government than a farmer who resides outside such corporate limits? If the service is to be curtailed, why commence in the country first? Why not in the city where every resident is within easy walking distance of the post office?

If the Post Office Department is running behind and is in need of funds and is depriving the farmers of their mail service in order to avoid a deficit in your department, I wish to inform you that a better, more just, and popular alternative would be to increase the rates, and the farmers will gladly help pay the increased postage rates, together with the rest of the population. The service should not be decreased; much rather increase the rates.

The farmers strongly resent your department's policy in curtailing the rural route mail service; they are convinced not only that they need the mail delivered to them daily, but that they are entitled to such service. Furthermore, in this controversy, the farmers are exhibiting a determination that they are going to have their free rural delivery service—not curtailed—not only when the roads are good, but that they are going to have it extended until every farmer receives that daily service, rain or shine.

The patrons of the West Grove office asked for an inspector, and they made out such a strong case that the department finally decided to send one out. His report was filed during the holidays. What do we find in that report? The inspector says:

A drive was made over all the roads from which service was removed, and the following patrons were found to be discommoded by the changes for distances approximately as follows.

The report then names 65 heads of families who were on the routes before the changes and gives the distance that each of said patrons now lives from any route. The report shows that 45 of them now are one-half mile or more from any route. Does this inspector offer or recommend any relief? Whether he had instructions beforehand to report a certain way or not, I do not know. He ends his report with this consoling statement:

It is believed that with the proposed changes placed in effect the service will fully meet the requirements of section 716½, Postal Laws and Regulations, as amended, and I recommend the changes as shown on the amended descriptions be placed in effect.

I wonder what the findings would have to be in order to warrant a reestablishment of a route under this post-office administration.

This is the only inspection we have been able to get since the Post Office Department began its policy of slaughtering the rural routes. We appeal to the Post Office Department with our grievances, and for relief we are informed that the changes will be placed in effect. We then turn to the distinguished chairman of the Post Roads Committee, and we are gently admonished to "wait and have patience."

I, too, have received a letter from the Fourth Assistant. On the 17th of last month I received a letter from Mr. Blakslee, which closed as follows:

Can you suggest any locality in your district where a rural route would provide better mail facilities for your constituents?

On the 22d of the month I filed with him formal protests against the discontinuance of 16 routes in my district and the extension of 21 routes to lengths I deemed excessive, and requested inspectors and relief for each route. And four days later I received the following reply:

JANUARY 28, 1916.

Hon. C. W. RAMSEYER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. RAMSEYER: I am in receipt of your letter of the 22d instant, relating to the revision of rural service in the sixth congressional district of Iowa, represented by you, resulting in the discontinuance of 16 routes and the extension of a number of other routes to what you deem excessive lengths, and your remarks concerning the matters have been noted.

In reply, I beg to inform you that an inspector will be detailed to visit each of the offices mentioned in your letter at which rural routes have been discontinued to confer with the postmaster and those interested and ascertain what, if any, further changes are essential to provide reasonable facilities for the patrons.

The inspector's attention will be directed to your observations as to the lengths of some of the routes which have been amended in connection with the revision and which, in your opinion, are now too long to be served satisfactorily.

Sincerely, yours,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

He promises what? He promises to send inspectors out to visit the postmasters to ascertain what further changes are essential. We are not asking for visitors. What we want is inspectors sent out there with instructions to ascertain the facts that will lead to the establishment and continuance of so efficient a rural service that, in so far as possible, will guarantee to every farmer the delivery of his daily mail at his front gate every workday. Nothing less than that is going to satisfy the rural population, and they are entitled to that consideration from this Government as much as any city or town dweller. I do not know how other Members of this House feel about it, but I am almost convinced that there is little hope of any relief until the present head of the Post Office Department is supplanted by some one who understands and is in sympathy with the needs and wishes of the farmers of the Middle West. Unless the department gives speedy relief, the people will look to Congress for prompt and effective action.

BUSINESS AND SOCIAL RELATIONS.

I was very much impressed with the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] on last Saturday, in which he told how the changes affected the business and social relations of the people in different communities in his district. When the rural routes were first laid out regard was had for these things. So far as possible a farmer should have his mail from the town where he does his trading. There is his banker, his merchant, his physician, and it is to that place he has his telephone connections. Frequently the farmer is busy, but needs merchandise, groceries, or repairs; he telephones to his town and his needs are supplied within a few hours by the rural carrier. Or perchance a member of the family is sick, but not sick enough to require the expense of a visit by the family physician. By the use of the telephone and the parcel post, the medicine is in the home the same day.

Many farmers have gone into certain kinds of business relying on the rural mail service. On account of the changes many farmers are practically ruined. I have a number of letters in my office to substantiate this statement. Only last week I received a letter from a young farmer who has gone into the pure-bred poultry business. By the use of the daily mail and the parcel post he carried on his business, as the route went past his residence. But last fall a clerk in the Post Office Department went over a map with a blue pencil. The route past this farmer's house was discontinued. He was placed on a route out of another town, and his mail box had to be placed over a mile away from his home. This new route is over 30 miles long, and when the roads are bad this carrier does not and can not make his entire route, and this young farmer is without regular service, and further, he can not tell what days he will be served and what days he will not be served. He writes me:

We take 11 papers, some of them dailies, and we raise and sell pure-bred poultry and eggs; but we will have to quit both poultry and papers if we can't get our route back.

Will anyone here rise to contend that this farmer has no rights which the Postmaster General is bound to respect?

I tell you frankly I have not much confidence in this belated promise to send out inspectors. If the Postmaster General was really sincere in his statement that these changes were made to increase the efficiency of the service, and not simply to save money at the expense of the farmers, why did not he send the inspectors out first so he could have had some knowledge of what effect his policy would have before he commenced making the changes on the recommendations of an office clerk, who had nothing before him except a map and a blue pencil?

I am not opposed to all changes in rural routes. But in making changes it ought to be the policy of the department—and that should always be kept uppermost—to extend the service and improve the efficiency of the service. Practice economy, certainly. Get the service for a reasonable expenditure of money. But the service ought not to be crippled and curtailed just to save the money which is required to give the farmers an efficient and more extended service.

THE RURAL CARRIERS.

There has been a good deal said about the rural carriers. One charge is that their salary is out of proportion to the time they put in and the kind of service they are required to perform. To begin with, every carrier has to have from two to four horses, with vehicles and other equipment. These horses have to be fed. The running expenses have to be taken out before he can consume for himself and family. And even with $1,200, the end of the year usually finds him no better off than at the beginning.

Some carriers have automobiles, which they use when the roads are good. With the use of the automobile the route can be made in three or four hours. This has led some people to believe that the carrier has a snap. However, in Iowa every carrier with an automobile has to have his horses to make his route when the roads are bad. In fact, the automobile is an extra burden. The carrier has to go every day, rain or shine, hot or cold, in all and every kind of weather, year after year. Taking it altogether, who is it that will dare to say that the job of a rural carrier is not a man's job and that he does not render value received for every cent that the Government pays him?

Last fall, after some of the changes in the rural service had been announced, I undertook a thorough investigation of the rural service in my district. With reference to the use of automobiles, I found 57 carriers who had used automobiles for more than one year, and their reports to me as to the average number of workdays yearly they have been able to use the automobile to deliver mail were as follows:

Davis County, 7 automobiles, 109 days.
Jasper County, 7 automobiles, 126 days.
Keokuk County, 15 automobiles, 137 days.
Mahaska County, 9 automobiles, 137 days.
Monroe County, 7 automobiles, 105 days.
Poweshiek County, 6 automobiles, 128 days.
Wapello County, 6 automobiles, 130 days.

This makes an average of 124 days, or a few days less than five months. Very few of these carriers kept a record of the days they used automobiles, and therefore of necessity these figures are estimates and not absolutely correct.

The department has undertaken to establish auto service on some rural routes. Where they have hard surfaced roads such a service ought to be entirely practical. However, I doubt very much whether satisfactory and efficient service over Iowa dirt roads could be procured by establishing a 50 or 60 mile rural route to be served entirely by automobile.

LENGTH OF ROUTES.

Nearly as much dissatisfaction was caused by the extension of routes as by the discontinuance of routes. It is somewhat difficult to determine what the length of a route should be. That depends on climatic conditions and road conditions. No route should be so long that it can not be made daily during the bad seasons of the year. Then it is that the farmers are more desirous for their mail than when weather and roads are good, as it is during the time of bad weather they have more leisure and read more. I doubt whether any route over Iowa dirt roads should be over 26 miles. The standard route is now 24 miles. Carriers who have routes less than 24 miles get less salary. Those whose routes are over 24 miles ought to have proportionately more pay. It is usually the last few miles of these long routes that tell most on horseflesh and adds to the extra expense of the carrier.

Since last October in my district there have been, as shown by the records of the Post Office Department, 16 routes discontinued and 62 routes changed in length; 4 were slightly shortened and 58 were lengthened, and in number in the different counties as follows:

Davis County, 3 discontinued, 6 changed in length.
Jasper County, 2 discontinued, 7 changed in length.
Keokuk County, 6 discontinued, 24 changed in length.
Mahaska County, 2 discontinued, 9 changed in length.
Monroe County, none discontinued, 2 changed in length.
Poweshiek County, 1 discontinued, 6 changed in length.
Wapello County, 2 discontinued, 8 changed in length.

All these discontinuances and changes in length were made by some clerk in the Post Office Department in Washington, D. C., and, from all information I can obtain, not in a single instance was there either a discontinuance or a change in length made upon the recommendation of an inspector.

The lengths of routes, as shown by the records of the department, in the district which I represent are as follows—I omit all fractions of miles:

19-mile routes	1
21-mile routes	1
22-mile routes	7
23-mile routes	5
24-mile routes	25
25-mile routes	24
26-mile routes	22
27-mile routes	24
28-mile routes	21
29-mile routes	15
30-mile routes	10
31-mile routes	1

Ninety-three of the one hundred and fifty-six routes are 26 or more miles long and only 14 less than 24 miles long. According to the act of Congress, the maximum salary is paid to carriers for the 24-mile route. For mileage less than 24 miles the carrier is paid less, but for mileage in excess of 24 miles the carrier receives no additional pay.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I wish to state that the right of the farmers to their daily mail is not a mere gratuity to be withheld or extended at the caprice of the Post Office Department. A number of bills have been introduced to correct the evils caused by the policy of the present Postmaster General, but I still believe that an intelligent and sympathetic administration of the rural routes will be more conducive to efficiency and extension of the service than if the department is restricted by too many laws. Remember this, the farmers have had the service, they have a right to the service, and they are going to have the service as a right. If that right is not properly safeguarded by the Post Office Department, then there is no other course for Congress to pursue than to in a very effective way safeguard that right. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, Mr. MOON, the gentleman from Tennessee, the other day in reply to a question from my colleague, Mr. DOWELL, of Iowa, said in substance that the Fourth

Assistant Postmaster General had informed him by letter that inspectors would be sent into every place in the United States where complaints have been made relative to the mail service.

I hope that this is not an empty promise, and that its fulfillment will not be long deferred, for I know that a long-suffering and patient public will welcome any kind of relief from the present deplorable condition in which we find the mail service in Iowa and other States of this Union.

Mr. MOON. May I ask how many routes are disarranged according to the theory which the gentleman presents?

Mr. SWEET. I can not yield. I have only five minutes, Mr. Chairman. I am sorry.

The report of the committee that accompanies the bill that is now before the House for consideration contains a statement to the effect that the estimates of the department under the head of "Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, pay of rural letter carriers," are $48,500,000. The committee instead of recommending $48,500,000 have recommended $53,000,000.

In the report we find this language:

> The increase of recommendations by the committee over the estimates of the department is due largely to the fact that the committee was not content with the appropriation of $48,500,000 for the maintenance and extension of the Rural Delivery Service and increased the amount to $53,000,000, the same as carried in the appropriation for 1916.

I trust that this extra $4,500,000 will be expended by the department for the betterment, maintenance, and extension of the Rural Free Delivery Service as recommended by the committee.

The present condition of affairs has come about during the present administration and through the acts of the present Postmaster General and his assistants.

At this time we do not challenge the good faith of the department, but we do condemn the plans and methods by which the changes have been wrought, and the arbitrary manner in which its orders have been exercised and carried out, regardless of the facts, the wishes of the patrons, and the rights of the people generally.

As to whether the Postmaster General has an arbitrary right to discontinue our mail routes at will I will not discuss at this time. It sufficeth to say that he has exercised that right in the name of economy, at the expense of the efficiency of the service and the convenience of the patrons of the routes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SWEET. We are all in favor of economy, and the mail service of this great country should not be impaired and sacrificed upon the altar of a "false economy."

What we want is an efficient, economical mail service throughout the entire country. If that is what the present administration has endeavored to give us, then it has ignominiously failed from the standpoint of business efficiency and economy.

Routes have been arbitrarily discontinued. Changes have been made without proper inspection and without consulting the conveniences of the patrons, and they have been made in contravention of the rights and privileges of towns and communities directly interested.

In many instances the changes appear to have been made without investigation and without any method or well-matured plan.

This, of course, is disclaimed by the department, but the facts are overwhelmingly to the contrary.

At the beginning of this administration we were having reasonably good mail service. The fact that it is now demoralized and unsatisfactory is conclusive proof, to my mind, that a great blunder has been committed by the Post Office Department.

Instead of the Rural Mail Service being hampered it should be extended and perfected. Another thing, our people have petitioned the department for relief, but their petitions have not always been properly considered.

The people have protested by means of telegrams and letters, but their protests have been of no avail.

The people, through their Representatives, have supplicated the head of the department and his assistants, but their supplications have been in vain.

The edict had gone forth. The orders are unchanged and apparently unchangeable. The discontinuance of routes went on and the demoralization of the service continued.

In justice to the department it should be said, however, that the petitions, protests, and supplications have usually been courteously received, but the people and their Representatives not only want courteous treatment but they want results. They demand action. They want most of the routes restored. They want an efficient and economical mail service.

The farming and agricultural districts have suffered the most. In many instances those who have been in the habit of getting their mail at their doors are now required to go 1 and 2 miles to their mail boxes.

There are persons in certain communities who have always been contributory to certain towns who, in many instances, have had their post-office addresses changed without their consent to other towns from which the remaining routes extend. We thus have the unusual spectacle of many of our farmers doing business in one town and getting their mail in another.

Old and tried mail carriers have lost their jobs.

The remaining routes have been extended and burdened with the mail of routes that have been discontinued. Routes before the change were long enough when you take into consideration the seasons of the year, when the roads are bad and the snow in winter is deep and the storms unusually severe.

As evidence of some of the hardships and inconveniences that have resulted, I wish to call your attention briefly to a few facts in this connection:

In one instance that now comes to my mind a rural route was discontinued which led out of the town of Stanley, Buchanan County, Iowa. A farmer living 1½ miles from Stanley was placed on a route extending out of the town of Aurora, some 5 or 6 miles distant. This farmer, in order to communicate with the banker or merchant in the town of Stanley, where he had always done business, would be required to place his letter in the mail box and it would go to Aurora by rural route, and from Aurora to Stanley by train. The letter of the banker or merchant in reply would go by train to Aurora and from Aurora to the farmer by rural route.

In other words, the farmer could communicate by letter with a banker or merchant in Chicago as easily as with the merchant or banker in the town of Stanley, which is only 1½ miles distant. What is the result? The farmer is required to abandon the rural free delivery service and pay for a post-office box in the town of Stanley.

What the people of Iowa want is simple justice in this matter. They want an efficient mail service. They want an immediate thorough investigation and inspection of the circumstances and conditions in each town and rural community where complaints are being made and, if necessary, the routes that have been discontinued should be restored, and, in so far as may be, arrangements should be made satisfactory to all parties and persons concerned. They want the department to take into consideration the seasons of the year, the climate, the rainfall, the roads—whether dirt, gravel, or paved—and if possible arrive at an equitable adjustment between all parties interested.

They want the Rural Free Delivery Service improved, extended, and strengthened in every way. If they do not get it during the present administration, I am of the opinion that they entertain a sincere hope that they may get some relief, at least, during the next administration.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I see by the papers this morning that they opened bids yesterday for two coast submarines whose construction Congress authorized as long ago as last March. Altogether, Congress has authorized only three ocean-going submarines, and yet Admiral Grant has testified that ocean-going submarines and not coast submarines are what we need.

At the rate we are going in building ocean-going submarines it will be more than three years before we have a single one completed.

I have been informed that last spring Secretary Daniels entered into a contract for the construction of the sea-going submarine Schley, and that the contract calls for its completion in three years. As the construction of the Schley was authorized in June, 1914, 14 months ago, and as not a stroke of work has yet been done on her, I am forced to the conclusion that the Navy Department is not aware of the fact that a war is going on in Europe. Furthermore, I notice in the papers that no later than yesterday Admiral Grant testified that we now have 35 submarines under construction or authorized. That is true; but let us separate the figures. To be exact, we have 19 coast submarines under construction. They were authorized in 1912, 1913, and 1914. We also have 16 coast submarines whose construction was authorized last March on which no single stroke of work has yet been done.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I also yield 15 minutes to the gentleman, so as to give him half an hour.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to thank the gentlemen in charge of this bill. I shall speak on preparedness, how to get ready for war, and I thank them because they recognize that this is a matter to be considered now.

I shall speak on the failure of Congress to provide for the common defense—the failure of Congress, of ourselves. The first object of the Constitution when we formed a more perfect union was to provide for the common defense. War, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, is a business, and a business has to have certain things to carry it on. The first is brains and the second is tools, and every war experience of the present day tells us we must provide the brains and that we must provide the tools. You have heard from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] as to tools for the Navy. Vessels are special tools for the first defense of our coasts. There must be vessels along the coast which can keep foreign navies at a distance, but there is a difference of opinion as to the kind of vessels. My own judgment is that the armored dreadnaught dreads the torpedo boat, surface or submarine, and that swarms of those smaller boats, though they can not go far to sea, are the only defense for our shores, our sounds, and our coasts. But I do not now speak on that, as it will be for the experts and for the Congress to determine. I am going to speak on a perfectly plain matter. If the Navy fails to defend our coast there is no defense except in the Nation in arms. [Applause.] The Nation in arms! Forts are nothing. They defend naval bases only.

We can not put a gun every 500 feet along the coast. In 1776 the English army that was defeated at Boston landed on Long Island without difficulty and took the City of New York. Expeditions now go to the Mediterranean with two or three hundred thousand men, and they land either at the Dardanelles or at Saloniki, as they please. Japan took millions across the China seas to Manchuria. Millions have gone across the English Channel. Our defense must be in land forces and in the Nation in arms. The question is now, how soon we can put the Nation in arms, and the answer is, no sooner than we can furnish them with arms. And we must first furnish them with skilled officers, who must be provided beforehand, or else we shall not get them for years.

In our Civil War the North had about 20,000,000 population. It took them nearly three years to put a million soldiers in the field, or one-twentieth of the population. One-twentieth of the population of the central powers of Europe were across the border within two days and one-tenth are there in arms now. A population of 65,000,000 after awful losses has in the field one-tenth of the population—double what we had in the Civil War. It is a question of how soon the Nation can get under arms if it has to meet such armies.

As already stated, that depends upon officers and arms provided and ready. Our Constitution was made in a time of profound peace, and that Constitution not only ordered us to provide for the common defense, but gave to the Congress power to provide for arming, organizing, and disciplining the whole Nation. The word "militia" meant the whole Nation, for within three years Congress passed a law that the militia should consist of every man—every free ablebodied citizen—from 18 to 45 years of age. The Constitution and its framers intended to provide for arming the whole Nation, for organizing it as a militia and having it disciplined.

UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I, SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power * * * To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

There is but one nation in the world that has done this thing, a little nation in the mountains of central Europe, which has put a rifle in every man's hand which he keeps in his own home with his uniform, from the time that he enlists, or rather from the time he is drafted into the service. That free people turned out their whole population for the common defense within two days, and they have not been disturbed. Their liberties have remained unchallenged, small as they are. [Applause.] I commend to the attention of the House the description of the Swiss system, given by Mr. Garrison in his hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs. I now ask in this and other instances, Mr. Chairman, to be allowed to add notes, extending my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Here, as in all cases of extension of remarks, they are in fine print.]

[See statement of the Secretary of War, Lindley M. Garrison, House Committee on Military Affairs hearing, Jan. 6, 1916, p. 11.]

Many people who think that this situation has been successfully met in other places urge the adoption of the system in use in Switzerland or that in use in Australia. There is, unfortunately, very little accurate knowledge among many who discuss this matter concerning the details and what is involved in the adoption thereof.

Very briefly, the two systems are as follows:

Every male Swiss is liable to military service from the age of 20 until the age of 50, and officers until the age of 55. Between the ages of 10 and 16 the Swiss boy receives courses of gymnastics or calisthenics in the public schools, and after the last-named age the law requires him to go on with his gymnastics and to make a beginning at musketry. Rifle shooting is a national sport, and practically every boy belongs to rifle clubs that are under national auspices. The first line, called the "elite," consists of those from 20 to 32, inclusive; the second, or "landwehr," of those from 33 to 44, inclusive; the third consists of all others from 17 to 50 years of age. When a recruit reports he is fitted with his uniform and equipment and given a rifle, all of which must be taken care of by him and remain in his custody until the end of his military service. Recruits receive instruction from 60 to 90 days, depending upon their arm of the service. For the "elite" a repetition course of from 7 to 14 days is held every year. Sergeants and higher noncommissioned officers serve 10 repetition courses. In the "landwehr" a repetition course of 11 days takes place every four years for all the different arms. All work is in the field and on the target range. Universal service and the beginning of the work in the public schools are the most prominent elements of the Swiss system.

The Australian system likewise requires all male inhabitants to render military service. They are divided into junior cadets of those between the ages of 12 and 14, inclusive, who serve for 2 years for 90 hours each year; senior cadets, 14 to 18 years, serve 4 years, 4 whole days, 12 half days, and 24 night drills. Variations are permissible, provided the total remains the same. Citizen forces from 18 to 26 for 8 years, in first 7 years equivalent to 16 whole days, of which at least 8 must be in camp. There are particular requirements for particular branches of the service which need not be here gone into. Musketry is carried out on Saturday afternoons throughout the year, and nearly every training locality has rifle ranges within a few miles. As in the Swiss system, the attention given in the schools to gymnastics and preliminary education along military lines, together with universal military service, are the striking features of this system.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We all know that a cry of agony goes up all over Europe for arms, including munitions. My friend, Frederick R. Coudert, was at Paris at the outbreak of the war when the call was issued for troops by the French Republic, and he said in my presence in a public speech that 900,000 reservists then came to the colors who were sent home because there were no rifles to put in their hands. There had been an appropriation for rifles, but it was used to fill an appropriation for workmen's houses, and my friend added that there will be a good many houses now that will have to be rebuilt. What would have been the result, with respect to France's boundary, with those 900,000 men there, as they would have been if they had had the arms? Is there anything more pitiful than to call a free people to arms and not to have arms to put in their hands? Or is there anything in which a government can be more guilty than not to have arms ready?

Let us take the great eastern power of Europe. We used to read in the newspapers that their first armies—it is better now—went to battle with clubs—at least, men with clubs were behind those with rifles, so that when the front rank fell the rear rank could take the rifles. How much territory did that power lose?

Let us take the central powers. Three weeks ago there was in Frank Leslie's Magazine a picture of soldiers drilling who had not been in the original call, because the central powers had put only half their young men, as they became of military age, into the ranks and into training.

This is not generally understood, but it is true. They are now training the rest; and this picture showed them training with wooden guns. You have seen it stated in the newspapers from time to time that the reservists even of those great military nations were coming to the front armed with obsolete rifles. They are not bad rifles, but they are obsolete. Even those great military nations are also impeded in their military movements by having to use their population in making arms and munitions that ought to have been on hand. Those great central powers—what would they not have given for an abundant supply of arms for their whole able-bodied population of double their present armies, to have swarmed through Europe?

And then there is the old English-speaking Empire, on which the sun never sets. Gen. Francis V. Greene says, in a recent article, that a few months ago that Empire had 2,000,000 men enlisted, but not sent forward, because they had not equipment and arms. Two millions—the same number—is given by competent military authorities here.

Oh, Mr. Chairman, that every one of you could have been with me during the past fall, when I spent two months on the other side. It is not needful to tell anything I learned in confidence. But when you are there, such public statements as I have quoted are found to be true. They do not appeal to a man as mere statements in newspapers, but he sees the agony of great nations that have not arms to put into the hands of their soldiers when the time has come, and when they know, as I know, that arms, artillery, munitions, and officers for a hundred men can be provided in 20 years for the cost of keeping one man in a standing army for those 20 years. The provision must include officers thoroughly instructed, if not educated at West Point, so as to give one such officer to every 100 men. I have described this before, and I do not need to give the figures again. Arms and officers, tools and brains are what are needed, and we were ordered to provide them by the Constitution of the United States when it told us to arm, organize, and discipline the militia.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 15 minutes; 15 minutes remain.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Of the hundreds and thousands of men that were seen, whether at a distance in camp or marching through the streets in Great Britain, three months ago—it is better now, as stated by the people who have just come from the other side—that of those hundreds and thousands of men there were not many camps where they had rifles for the men, except a few used in rifle practice. The recruits were drilling without guns. Whenever men were seen marching through the streets with rifles on their shoulders it was assumed that they were going direct to the front.

Even in France, on the railroad train, English camps could be seen 20 miles back from the firing line, and no rifles were visible on the men's shoulders. To a question whether the men had rifles in their tents, a fellow passenger answered, "Perhaps they have not any." If some man is sick or disabled, they take his rifle at the front." Conditions are better now. It is understood that that great country was generous enough to give its supply of rifles to others who were nearer the front, and that it has supplied itself afterwards. But that was done at untold expense. The chief statesman of that country, Mr. Lloyd George, was made minister of munitions. He would probably be premier if any change should be made. Their greatest man was appointed minister of munitions because they need arms in the presence of an enemy more than aught else.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman favor the continental army scheme?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have not spoken of any army scheme. I propose that we shall make rifles, that we shall make cannon, that we shall have powder, that we shall have nitrates, which are essential to powder, and without which we can make none. If our Navy should be defeated, we would be absolutely cut off from nitrates to make powder, and we have not two months' supply on hand. Mechanical production from the air is possible, but it is still in the air (see appendix as to nitrates). Let me say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], in reply to his question, that I favor any scheme—enlargement of the Army, or a continental army, or whatever it may be; but such schemes are for only a few hundred thousand men, and are all subordinate to the ability to arm the Nation, for nations are now in arms. As I saw it expressed this morning, the last man must go to the front, and arms are needed to send him there. To provide arms is our first duty under the Constitution. In this war standing armies are gone. There were about 225,000 men in the English Army, with some reserves, at the beginning of the war. They are all gone. It is worse as to officers. In the list of wounded 1 officer is wounded to every 30 privates, but in the list of killed 1 officer is killed to every 15 privates. It is the officer who must put his head up out of the trenches to watch, and dies with a bullet through the brain.

Yet the losses among the men are something that we do not understand or imagine. English newspapers, urging recruiting, say that it takes 1,800 recruits a year to keep a battalion of a thousand men full, and large camps are maintained so as to be able to send forward 150 men a month to fill vacancies in a battalion of a thousand; in other words, nearly double the whole number die in every year. It is the most terrific slaughter and the most tremendous heroism that the world has ever seen. How much better it would have been if the legislatures of the different countries had provided the matériel.

The $6,000,000 that we spend annually now on a militia of about 100,000 men would have given us 400,000 rifles a year, and in 10 years we would have had 4,000,000 rifles. The money has been used in other ways.

Of course artillery and ammunition cost more; but for training the first thing is to have the rifles. Fifteen million dollars a year would give us a million rifles a year, and we ought to have them. Just about the time of the Spanish War, when I was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I had the appropriation increased so that we made 100,000 rifles a year instead of 16,000. About 10 years ago, when they wanted to economize, about 1907, they reduced that appropriation. I was not on the committee then and did not notice it. Under last year's appropriation they are now making only 16,000 rifles a year, or hardly enough to make up the waste in the Regular Army. We have on hand, including rifles in use, 750,000 Springfields and about 300,000 or 350,000 Krags, which are good rifles, though using a different cartridge, and that is all we have for our able-bodied male population of 20,000,000. If we call out one-twentieth of our total population, or one-quarter of the able-bodied, there would be 5,000,000 men in the field. If we turned out one-half of the able-bodied, we would have to put 10,000,000 men in the field, and with the wastage we would have to call on the whole 20,000,000 if necessary until they were disabled, because America must stand to her arms, and she must have the arms to stand to before she can go into war.

The proposed continental army was 400,000.

Gen. Crozier (hearings, Jan. 24, p. 38) says: "The War Department project contemplates men carrying rifles, including reserves, citizen soldiers, of whatever class they are—everybody of that kind—to the number of over 900,000."

That is less than 1 per cent of our population, less than 5 per cent of our able-bodied men. It is less than the number that one-fifth of our present population put under arms in the Civil War.

One-tenth of Europe's population is now on the fighting line. One-tenth of our population is 10,000,000 men. The whole 20,000,000 men ought to be on call. It costs only $15 to give each man a rifle—say $15,000,000 a year for 20 years.

The Government gun factories working eight hours can make 500 rifles in a day, and they can make fifteen hundred, or half a million a year, if they work three shifts, or 24 hours every day, Sundays included, and they could give us 20,000,000 rifles in 40 years.

We can not wait for that. We need more factories. It takes time to install machinery, to learn processes and the use of new tools.

In the beginning of the war rifle contracts were placed in America. It took a whole year to get the machinery installed.

It is understood that since August last about 100,000 a month have been shipped. The factories are largely increased. (See Crozier, p. 40 of his hearing.)

We want aeroplanes, automobile transports, hand grenades, and men who know how to use them; but we want above all the means of supply. Munition factories have been built lately for foreign demand.

They should be kept in operation for our own supply, not at exorbitant prices, but buying freely whenever they ask only a reasonable profit over the cost as ascertained in our own Government plants.

Let us hope that we shall never again go to war without arms to put in the hands of our gallant boys.

Former wars gave us time to prepare; in modern war it is preparedness or death.

To provide for organizing the Nation in arms includes provision for officers. It costs $4,000 to put a man through West Point. He takes a four years' training and he is good for 40 years. Each cadetship gives 8 or 10 graduates, each of whom in case of war would be good for 100 men. So that if you divide the cost of keeping a cadet at West Point, the $1,000 spent each year, by 800, or 1,000, it costs a very small sum per year to provide an officer to the man with the rifle. Do we not need such graduates? Do we not need them in the community where they would join the militia and give it tone? Do we not need them in the community to teach the art of war in our schools?

The Constitution made it our duty to provide arms. Congress did not do it. They ordered every man to bring his gun. The Constitution told Congress to provide for organizing the militia.

By the militia act of 1792 Congress did not provide for enrollment and organization of the militia by the United States as ought to have been done, but asked the States to do this, and provided that each man should bring his own gun. When Congress neglected its duty others neglected theirs. In 1802 to 1807 President Jefferson reported that he had not received reports from various States, and that the reports that he had were sometimes two or three years old. Those reports often showed only about two-thirds the number of guns that there were privates in the ranks and an even less number of bayonets and cartridge boxes and equipment. The system had failed, because Congress had not made provision for arming the men. In the testimony of Gen. Bliss, on January 12, before the Committee on Military Affairs, he gave at the end of his testimony a copy of a bill drawn by Mr. Jefferson, preceded by a letter of September 9, 1814, in which Mr. Jefferson said, as to the volunteers:

But I fear they can not be armed. I think the truth must now be obvious that our people are too happy at home to enter into regular service and that we can not be defended but by making every citizen a soldier, as the Greeks and Romans, who had no standing armies, and that in doing this all must be marshaled, classed by their ages, and every service ascribed to its competent class.

In 1805 he had drawn a militia bill dividing the militia between the ages of 18 and 45 into classes according to age, and providing that they be armed by the Government.

Each person of the said junior class shall be furnished with a good musket, bayonet, and cartridge box at the public expense so soon as they can be provided, which, except where he shall be of the Cavalry or Artillery, he shall be bound to produce in good order at every muster of which he shall be, so long as he shall be under the age of 45 years, after which it shall be his property.

The bill drawn by Jefferson is interesting, because it contains a provision that every militiaman when he enters shall be furnished with a good musket, bayonet, and cartridge box at the public expense as soon as they can be provided, and, so long as he be under the age of 45 years, he is to appear annually for inspection, after which they shall be his property. Mr. Jefferson recognized the need of providing arms. It is a small thing, but it is the essential thing if we come to war.

Now, I am going to make one or two practical suggestions. (See Appendix B as to cost.) I am very much obliged for the speech made by the distinguished Speaker of this House. It was a splendid speech. I agree with every word of it.

As to discipline, the United States is to prescribe it, and the States have authority only to train the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. Now, the United States has given tactics, but has never prescribed the discipline, except for a National Guard of 1 in 200 of the militia of able-bodied citizens. We have never said how often they should drill each year. The old militia act did say there should be one training day. If we could order one, we could order more. We have not provided as to the mode of enforcing attendance, and, as a result, in some of the States, including my own, no man is to be imprisoned for a militia fine under our State constitution. That provision is against the powers of Congress, which ought to order that every man should be imprisoned for a militia fine, so that he would do his duty. It is the business of Congress to prescribe the discipline.

But then they say we can not make the States train them. If we order so many training days a year, it is the duty of the State to train according to that discipline, and discipline will include the days of training.

But we may well rely a great deal more upon voluntary work and enthusiasm than upon control. Is there anything in which the whole Nation is so interested as in voluntary athletics—the games of football or baseball? Every boy thinks of nothing else. If Congress would give arms to the public schools, give them a chance to drill, furnish enough graduates of military schools as instructors, or even put enough graduates in the community, arrange for competitive inspection and prizes, which will not cost much, more could be done by the enthusiasm of the scholars in the military game than by any attempt at control. That is so in Switzerland. Switzerland has separate cantons, and the separate cantons manage all that, not the State. By means of rifle clubs and rewards of merit, putting the soldiers in different classes, they have a spirit of self-defense among the freemen of that country that does not need any control and does not brook any control, and that is what we want here. [Applause.]

Australia begins military training between the ages of 12 and 14 years. Some of you may have had a gun before you were 10 years of age. I did, certainly before I was 12, and used to go shooting. They do not do it any more in the cities. There is every reason why a boy should be taught how to handle a gun and what the dangers are, and if he were taught we would not have as many accidents.

We have no less than 9,000,000 enrolled boys—9,328,502 (see Report of Commissioner of Education, 1914, vol. 2, p. 12) subject to common schooling, of which about two-thirds, or 6,000,000, attend daily. Would that rifles were on hand to enable drill to be had in marching, shooting, and obeying orders in every one of these schools, for what is learned young is never forgotten. One of the most military men in his bearing that I ever saw had training in a military school when he was 11 years old, and he marched 35 miles on a practice march of a week.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have only a short time. I will if it is short.

Mr. EMERSON. Does not the gentleman think that giving rifles by the Government to these rifle clubs encourages rifle clubs throughout the country?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do; and I was going to say something about the schools, universities, and colleges.

In the colleges, universities, and technical schools we have over 25,000 teachers and 217,000 male scholars. I said a moment ago that there were 9,000,000 in the common schools, but there are 114,900 male teachers. That is an army in itself. Our public high schools include over 25,000 teachers and 541,000 students. In our private high schools there are 5,800 male teachers and 72,000 students. These are armies in and of themselves. They can be trained without taking a single man from his avocation, and their vacations can be made the time for any camp, which they would enjoy as a picnic.

What is the use of compulsion if we can excite the military spirit in these schools? But it can not be done, my friends, it can not be done unless we can supply the arms and instruction. With this we can train the whole body of the people, and shall be invincible. Napoleon said, "A nation in arms in its own defense is invincible." That is true. I have yet to find an exception. The nations of the Balkans that have just fallen were conquered not by their enemy but by the new artillery, the new arms which they did not possess. It was this that brought their resistance to an end. They were not really in arms, for they had not provided the best.

In the South African Republic the victors of many a battle went down before the lyddite shells that drove them out of the intrenchments. If they had provided the same arms, the nation in arms needed no defense and was invincible.

But oh, the sadness of seeing a nation called to arms when there are no arms to put in their hands. Numbers do not help. What cares the wolf how many sheep there be in the flock if there be no dog or protectors armed to resist him. If we should come into war, which God forbid, the first question that would be put by every citizen to us would be to ask why we did not do our duty in providing arms and organization, including officers, and prescribing discipline for them, so that they should be able to defend themselves. [Applause.]

APPENDIX A.

NITRATES.

Powder and shot are wasted as never before. Washington at Boston rejoiced when able to get a few tons of saltpeter.

One of our admirals wishes 30,000,000 pounds of nitrate, say, about 14,000 tons at, say, $50 a ton or only $700,000, and he says it would be two years' supply. Judging from modern warfare, it might not be two weeks' supply.

Nitrates are to be got in quantities only from Chile. We are urged to make them out of the nitrogen in the air. We ought to try, but it is all in the air at present. We do not know the cost, and we have not the machinery. The beds in Chile will some day be exhausted. It is still cheap because the demand of Europe for agriculture and war has been cut off.

Nitrates last forever if stored under cover, but we can not make a pound of powder without them, and we have not a month's supply on hand.

Whether the appropriation is for fortifications, the Navy, or the Army, it would be a good investment to buy all we could get, for it will never be so cheap again and never so easily obtained. There were times when every household saved its ammonia for gunpowder, not only during the Revolution but during the late war between the States. A hostile fleet or embargo might easily cut us off from Chile. Let us provide nitrates for war, mining, or peaceful tillage.

The most ardent advocate of peace can not object to this form of preparedness.

I was in Congress when we younger Members formed a sort of caucus to protest against delay in action on the sinking of the Maine. A subcommittee, one of whose members is here at present, was asked by our great war President, to come and see him. They came back to tell us to disband for they had learned in confidence that we had neither powder, shot, shell, nor the ability to make them; that we were short of guns and transports; and that we were waiting to buy them abroad.

In modern war we should not have that opportunity, but should have to surrender for want of supplies. It makes war much more likely that this should be true; it will make for peace, that we shall be known to have material for powder. (See Gen. Crozier hearing, Jan. 24, pp. 19, 20, and 21.)

APPENDIX B.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS—IT IS BRAINS AND TOOLS THAT ARE CHEAP.

Land warfare is not a question of standing armies, but of being able to give officers and arms to a nation of trained men. Arms, artillery, and brains are needed for the millions, and they can be provided for the cost of permanently enlisting a few hundred thousand. It would cost $10,000,000 if we put 10,000 cadets into military academies which could be run in barracks or even in camps, and we should from the first have 10,000 selected men as an addition to our Army. We should graduate one-quarter of their number every year, and at the end of 20 years there would be 40,000 officers in the community ready to give an officer to every 125 men of 5,000,000 volunteers.

Fifteen million dollars a year would give a lieutenant's pay to 1,000 educated men who would accept a single year's commission in the Army to learn to be officers and return to civil life.

Five million dollars a year would give 400 rounds of rifle cartridges to each of our 500,000 collegiates and high-school boys in order to practice marksmanship, and $5,000,000 more would give $500 in competitive prizes for every 100 scholars and would encourage that emulation in the military game that has made other games almost the chief end of the school and college boy.

Fifteen million dollars a year would provide rifles for a million men a year, so that at the end of 20 years we should have the full provision for 10,000,000 men and a reserve of 10,000,000 more.

One hundred million dollars a year will provide each year artillery ammunition and equipment for 500,000 men, so that at the end of 20 years we should have full provision for 10,000,000 men.

Altogether, this is only $150,000,000, which would only pay for an addition to our Army of 150,000 men. The Constitution orders us to provide for the Nation.

Officers, arms, and military stores for the Nation are worth more than any standing army, and when once provided, appropriations can be reduced.

As practical Americans, let us apply practical business methods to the military art. That art like all others calls for education and tools. It is brains and skill that are cheap. We do not want merely promotions and appointments. We want to get military education and military stores.

I make a plain business proposition for doing our duty to our country. It can be varied in details, but should be maintained in principle.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. PARKER of New Jersey] has been telling us about preparedness. We do not in our State agree with his idea of preparedness, but we must all agree that preparedness costs money. I understand that the gentlemen on the Ways and Means Committee are racking their brains to find new methods of raising revenue. I would like to suggest the advisability of placing a tax on the future sales of grain on boards of trade where the deliveries are not actually made. Samuel H. Greeley, for many years a member of the Board of Trade of Chicago, is authority for the statement that there are 300 times more grain sold each year than is grown on the farms, and it does not require much mathematics to see that a very small tax would raise a large amount of revenue. Even a fraction of 1 mill upon all the grain sold in that way would increase the revenue something like a half billion dollars, assuming that the trade in "futures" would not be very much reduced. I imagine, however, those who are raising grain throughout the country would like to see the tax enough so that that kind of business would be greatly reduced.

How can a man object to a tax upon property which he attempts to sell and which he does not own, and which he never expects to own? If a man assumes to own something, he ought not to object to paying a reasonable tax on it—say, 1 cent per bushel.

Mr. Greeley says:

Manipulation and selling out of "futures" is the most potent factor in the depreciation of wheat values, and actual wheat prices follow the course of the "futures" market. There are 300 times more "futures" sold than actual wheat received in the grain-exchange markets.

Mr. Chairman, this "short-selling" system has given birth to such expressions in the trade as "raiding the market," "hedging," "effective selling pressure," "bear onslaught," "drastic liquidation," "selling drive," "pit speculators," "sharp breaks," "wild fluctuations," "stop-loss orders," "cleaning out of weak holders," and so forth, which fill the columns of the daily newspapers.

Mr. Greeley also describes in a graphic way a scene in the pit, as follows:

At 9.30 the gong in the tower signals the debauch. Hundreds of men jump, rush, grab, tumble, and yell in the great whirlpool of the pit. Every ear trained for the offer, every eye searching for the bid, they swoop down upon one another with the swiftness of the vulture and the talons of the eagle to devour the dollar, even as buzzards push and fight for the dead carcass on the plains. But in the midst of the intoxication, this drunken frenzy of money-mad insanity, there stands the cool, trained veteran, the elevator monopoly. Seasoned with years of experience, fortified with the confidence of his State-protected franchise, safeguarded with the blood money of the farm and the mulcted millions of the weak-minded, he suddenly dives upon the maddened throng and as the lion scatters the smaller beasts he proceeds to devour the weaklings which the private wires, blackboards, and chamber "cappers" have invited to his daily feast.

The mad pit in action! Cities boast of its triumphs, though its very doors are strewn with the memories of shattered fortunes and the dying groans of suicides, embezzlers, and financial wrecks.

Yes; this is the game which shapes the destinies of the farm, controls legislatures, subsidizes the press, molds public opinion, and forces children to follow the plow. Oh, ye mighty pit! Vain are your victories; infamous are your spoils!

Mr. Greeley continues:

A battle royal is on involving the great principle as to whether or not the producers of this country may be permitted to market the crops themselves, without being dominated and dictated to by the organized terminal monopoly operating within these grain exchanges.

The fight in the Northwest is being led chiefly by George S. Loftus, the sales manager of the farmers' terminal organization, the Equity Cooperative Exchange, in the city of St. Paul. Associated with him in the active work are ex-Congressman James Manahan, of Minneapolis; Benjamin Drake, of Minneapolis; M. D. Munn, of St. Paul; J. M. Anderson; and the splendid farmer board of directors of the Equity Cooperative Exchange, as well as hundreds of northwest-farmer stockholders.

Mr. Chairman, for the reasons stated and also on account of the uncertainty as to ocean transportation rates or the lack of publicity concerning such rates, it has been made possible for a band of get-rich-quick gamblers to gather in the heaviest toll ever filched from the tillers of the soil.

The Minneapolis Journal, whose market columns have an excellent reputation for accuracy, made the statement shortly before the war that the spread of 12 cents per bushel between Minneapolis and Liverpool represented the exact cost of transportation and commissions between those points. On November 27, 1915, the spread between Duluth and Liverpool was 71 cents per bushel, as follows:

Liverpool		$1.73
Duluth		1.02
Spread		.71
Fair handling cost per bushel:
Lake rates	$0.04
Elevator	.01
Commission	.01
Insurance	.02
Ocean rates (twice the peace rate)	.08
Foreign exchange	.01
Emergencies	.03
		.20
Profit of gambling and Shipping Trust		.51
Ocean rate actually charged	$0.28
Reasonable rate (double peace)	.08
Shipping Trust's hard-earned share of the profit		.20
Grain Trust's share of profit earned by much sweat (but not theirs)		.31
The average price of wheat in second congressional district of North Dakota on Nov. 27, 1915, was		.85
Cost of production		.70
Farmers' easy profit (only works 16 hours a day)		.15

While there was no undue modesty upon the part of either of these trusts, the grain gamblers got the biggest rake off, 31 cents per bushel. I believe it is fair to say that it is the most colossal get-rich-quick scheme ever pulled off since the South Sea Bubble.

Great Britain is the greatest importing nation for wheat, and as the world's annual crop is seldom more than sufficient to cover the world's annual consumption, the English market, where the surpluses from the different countries find their way, is naturally the first and basic factor in fixing the price. That is why every market page the world over gives the Liverpool quotations.

The United States is an exporter of wheat. We have a surplus every year without exception, hence the importance of the Liverpool quotations. The usual method for getting at the true value of wheat is to subtract the elevator and transportation charges from the Liverpool quotations. Local demands influence the market to some extent, but the basic factor is the Liverpool price. These factors in the main should determine the price, but they have only a small influence on the market as compared with the dealings in "futures" and gambling.

Many people overlook the very important fact that the farmers must not only pay the transportation charges upon the surplus wheat which goes abroad but also pay it upon the wheat which remains in our own country, since their market is fixed for the most part by the Liverpool price, less transportation charges.

There are three ways to get after the benevolent Grain Trust. First, by prosecuting them under the Sherman antitrust law; and, second, by prohibiting what is known as dealing in futures; and, third, by placing a tax on all sales of grain upon boards of trade for future delivery, where such deliveries are not in fact made; where deliveries are actually made there should be no tax.

Congress has thus far refused to pass a law to prohibit gambling in grain. Perhaps now, when the statesmen are racking their brains to find articles upon which to place a tax, such as gasoline, they may see the possibilities from the revenue standpoint as well as the justice of a tax on "futures." It would be difficult to estimate the amount of revenue from such a tax. If the trading in "futures" were to keep up to the present level, billions of dollars could be collected that way. It is fair to presume, however, that the tax would greatly reduce the amount of such transactions. If it would result in abolishing such practices, it would be a great blessing to the farmers as well as the suckers who play the market. [Applause.]

We have some gentry known as tin-horn gamblers, who come to North Dakota during the period when the farm laborers get their pay. They do much better financially than the poor fellows who work hard during the hot summer and the cold days of the fall and early winter. Their prototype is found on the big grain exchanges and, as will be seen from the figures already given, they have made during this crop-marketing season more than twice as much as the farmers on every bushel grown. The big gamblers differ from the tin horns in that they call their gambling joint boards of trade and themselves captains of industry.

The greed of the grain men is thoroughly discussed by former Congressman J. E. Kelley, of Pierre, S. Dak., in a series of articles which have appeared in the public press. Mr. Kelley has given many years of study to marketing problems. I ask permission to print these articles in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The articles are as follows:

THE MARKETING SIDE OF FARMING.

THE TAKING OF MILLIONS PROVED.

[By Hon. J. E. Kelley, Pierre, S. Dak., former Member of Congress.]

Since the opening of the grain markets the present season this writer has written many articles showing by cold facts and figures unanswerable that hundreds of millions of dollars was wantonly being taken from the farmers of this country by wheat raiders and speculators. We have been looking for some of the many of their mouthpieces to attempt some sort of excuse or explanation. Two have attempted it—the Cooperative Journal, of Chicago, and the Manager and Farmer, of Minneapolis. These two organs are among the most deadly enemies of farmers, for the reason that their pretense of friendship is ever paraded, and the subtleness with which they work into the confidence of the farmers enables them to attempt chloroforming them with at least some measure of success. Mr. Myers even writes songs for the farmers about breaking the combine, and tells them that he is their "hired man."

ADAMS SHARPER THAN MYERS.

The Manager and Farmer editor, however, proves himself the more adept in this controversy. In his attempted reply to the accusation of wholesale robbery of the farmers by the raiders, Adams says: "I will not dignify Mr. Kelley's statements by contradicting them." Neither does he attempt a contradiction, but goes on to say that I have made certain deductions "without entering into cost, points to those deductions as evidence of graft." Yet every element of cost was given in every article written by me. In my article of September 10 wheat was given as $1.62, No. 1 northern, Duluth in Liverpool:

	Cents.
Duluth, same date and grade	93.60
	68.40
Every known cost of handling deducted from remainder, which was, on that date	31.65
Thus the speculator took on that date on each bushel	36.75

Or over 40 per cent of the price the farmer got.

Cost of handling at that time was: Ocean rates from New York to Liverpool, 26 cents per bushel; insurance, $1.65; Lake rates 1 cent; elevator, 1 cent; canal proportionate billing, 2 cents; total, 31.65 cents. Mr. Adams, is the above plain enough? Can you see the cost of marine insurance given here which you said I did not give, which you thought was very high?

MR. MYERS GETS "IN BAD."

But Mr. Myers, editor of the Cooperative Journal, ventures farther than Mr. Adams, and accordingly gets in decidedly bad.

I believe that among other mouthpieces of the grain-gambling interests I have accused the Cooperative Journal of having for its chief occupation the chloroforming of the farmers while the skinning was going on.

In his attempted reply he has given proof positive that such is the case.

Mr. Myers comes out with a headline, "Will Mr. Kelley Take the Money?" and under this heading publishes a diatribe sent to him by one W. P. Manning, of Fairview, S. Dak., in which abuse and ignorance are equally mixed.

It has been well said that assumed patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel. With equal truth it may be said, abuse is the first refuge of an ignoramus. This fellow Manning does not know the difference between a foreign grain quotation and a pound sterling—but "where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise." Yet Manning is the exact kind that Mr. Myers and his masters, the grain gamblers, will pat on the back. The darker the ignorance, the surer the hold of the combine.

MR. MYERS'S ATTEMPT TO DECEIVE.

Mr. Myers tries to deceive his farmer readers by telling them that "the exchange base now is $4.70 instead of $4.80." By this means he hopes to ease the minds of the farmers while raiders are relieving them of about 40 per cent of the value of their produce.

Every person of intelligence knows that the buyer must stand the difference in exchange. It was to overcome this disadvantage that a French and English commission came over and made a loan of $500,000,000 recently. This money is here to pay for American produce. Hence, Mr. Myers, your little anesthetic has failed. The skinning game is going on at full blast, but some of the victims are likely to wake up if you don't get something more effective.

MR MYERS'S OPINION.

Mr. Myers's next opiate is this: "We do not believe that the price in Liverpool at any time was as high at $1.62. At least exporters tell us that no such price was obtainable this year." Did they tell you that, you poor little guy? And you gladly gulped the dope, did you? and you are now trying to pass it along. Now, Mr. Myers, I shall ask in return, "Will you take the money?"

MY PROPOSITION.

This proposition is that I shall meet you, Mr. Myers, and the exporter who gave you that information on any platform as agreed upon in the States of Iowa, South Dakota, North Dakota, Minnesota, or Montana, and if I do not prove to the satisfaction of such audience by substantial documentary evidence that such exporter, if he gave you such evidence, lied and falsified the records, then, in that case, I shall turn over to the poor of said State the sum of $200. If I do prove to the audience that your statement was untrue when you told your readers that grain was not as high as $1.62 the present year in Liverpool and that the figures given in my article appearing in the Sioux City Tribune of September 10 was and is substantially correct, then and in that case you and your exporting friend will turn over to the poor of said State the sum of $200.

A STILL MORE GLARING FALSEHOOD.

Mr. Myers was evidently getting desperate as he continued to write. It is quite apparent that Mr. Myers places a very low estimate on the intelligence of the farmers. It must be that he judges them all by his dear friend Manning, of Fairview.

In this instance he tries to run some gambling deal in futures in as cash grain. Now, Mr. Myers, did you think you could get away with that little trick? I will agree to the above conditions covering this attempt to deceive your readers, also. The price of cash grain September 29, Liverpool, was as follows:

"Liverpool, September 29, wheat, spot, Manitoba No. 1, 11s. 11d.; No. 2 11s. 9d.; No. 3, 11s. 8½d.; No. 1 northern, Duluth, 11s. 4½d." which, translated to our money, means that 60 pounds of Duluth No. 1 northern wheat was worth in Liverpool, September 29, $1.63.

Myers, Myers! "The way of the transgressor is hard."

Yet, after all of this juggling, falsifying, twisting, and turning to deceive the farmers and cover up those wholesale robberies by speculators and gamblers, he tells the truth in one instance.

SOME CREDIT DUE MR. MYERS.

Mr. Myers gets reckless and risks one item of truth, and therein admits every charge made. He gives a table showing the cost of transporting a bushel of wheat from Duluth to Liverpool and the price of wheat in Duluth and Liverpool on the 27th day of September, 1915. While some small errors are contained in those tables they are near enough for practical purposes.

Here are Mr. Myers's figures: "For example, on September 27 No. 1 northern at Liverpool is quoted about $1.70. Duluth No. 1 northern on the same date is $0.95. That shows a shipping difference of about 75 cents between the two markets."

The table of expense given by Mr. Myers shows an expenditure of 41.65 cents per bushel between Duluth and Liverpool, while 75 cents, he tells you, is the spread, so that the toll on each bushel is 33.35 cents. These figures sustain absolutely the figures given by me in the article of September 10, counting the advance in lake and ocean rates.

It matters nothing that Mr. Myers vainly tries to justify those figures. They are there, and they disclose in their enormity the most gigantic system of wholesale robbery ever enacted on this continent. Not only do those powerful freebooters rob the farmers of the Northwest, but everyone whose success in a business sense depends upon the success of the farmers and includes practically the entire populace of the Northwest.

On oats they are taking very much more than on wheat. Along about September 10 the farmers in this State were getting an average of 25 cents per bushel; on the basis of Liverpool prices the raiders were taking from 23 to 24 cents per bushel over every known cost of transportation. Neither are they taking any risk in transporting this grain. The Government furnishes the insurance at 1 per cent to belligerent countries down to one-fourth of 1 per cent to nonbelligerents. They take no risk.

Mr. Myers, in conclusion, may I ask you what "combine" are you now engaged in breaking, according to your song? The local elevator combination, before the advent of the farmers' elevator, in their palmiest day never took more than from 3 to 7 cents per bushel of toll. It was too much and justified the farmers in building their own local elevators and operating them. But what are those savings or losses to the wholesale steals of to-day, that run from 35 per cent, as Mr. Myers's table and figures show, to above 90 per cent of the value of oats, as my article of September 10 shows?

They are always in combination and collusion, and competition is never allowed to enter into the big deals. In my last article I pointed out that corn would soon go down, as the farmers soon would begin marketing. A few days ago it dropped about 6 cents at a clip. Corn has now dropped more than 22 cents per bushel since the high point. Watch it go still further down as the mighty manipulators go after it and the farmers dump it on the market—those who have it. But as it goes down here it goes up in Liverpool.

Watch how the twin saviors of the farmers, Myers and Adams, will work the chloroform racket as to the corn then as they work it on to wheat and oats now. When this writer pointed out at Mason City last February that 12 to 15 cents per bushel was then being taken on corn on the basis of Liverpool prices, grain solicitors told the farmers (and run the dope on a professor from Ames) that it cost 15 cents per bushel to kiln-dry all corn exported. What are the facts? None kiln-dried but in warm weather from New Orleans ports costs one-half cent per bushel to dry it when they do.

Still, that was a more decent lie than most of the stuff put out by those farmer saviors.

Their next lie is still more useless, though it may catch a few. It is the English jobber now, they say, that makes all of the mischief. It would seem that even the densest in the country would know that if there were such a thing as an English jobber (which there is not except in Myers's brain), he would hardly time his market manipulations so nicely with the passing of the grain from the possession of the farmers into the hands of the raiders, hold it to the cost of production while the farmers have it, make it soar to the skies when the speculators gather it in. But they will never escape exposure of those outrages, though they are putting on the "silencers" on some papers with the use of the "long green." Thank God there is still plenty of unpurchasable papers in this country and still enough of unpurchasable manhood to stand for the right and against the wrong, though such wrongs are backed up by countless millions.

I do not advise farmers as to holding their grain. I do advise them against flooding the markets at any time and thereby playing into the hands of the raiders. I do not make war against honest commission merchants who handle consigned grain. They are not to blame, and I believe many of them are rendering a fair service for the charge they make. It is the great millionaire speculators who control the elevator capacity of the country. They also control all boards of trade.

Farmers must have money in the fall to pay their bills, hence they must sell. They should be able to store grain somewhere and draw money against warehouse receipts. Any plan will suit this writer that will stop the flooding of the markets, thereby reducing the price of farm products below the cost of production. Wheat, oats, and barley have been right on the border line of production cost the entire fall, notwithstanding the high price in Europe, because of the enormous toll the market raiders are taking together with the Shipping Trust.

THE GRAIN GAMBLERS AND THE FARMERS.

[By Hon. J. E. Kelley, former Member of Congress.]

EDITOR PIERRE FREE PRESS: In its issue of September 13 the following appeared in the Sioux Falls Argus-Leader:

"With 80,000,000 bushels of corn, 56,000,000 bushels of wheat, 60,000,000 bushels of oats, 23,000,000 bushels of barley, * * * South Dakota would appear this year to be in line for some pretty fat times."

Sure enough, this speaks volumes for the energy and industry of the farmers of South Dakota; also, for the fertility of her soil and the favor of her climate. But let us stop and consider for a few minutes as to who gets the fat produced by South Dakota's industry. With the European war on, without a rift in the dark clouds, without a dent in the Dardanelles that would indicate the coming of a bushel of grain from the Russian fields, with every condition existing that ever did exist, past or present, to hold prices up to a level that would give the farmers of this State a fair reward for their industry, prices of wheat, oats, and barley have sunk to a level that scarcely covers the cost of production; and, the "fat time" that South Dakota has honestly and fairly won shall not be hers; but instead it will swell the proud purses of the Armours, the Pattens, the Ryans, the Leiters, the Van Deuzens, who with their compatriots constitute the mighty combine that control the grain markets of the United States.

Ten million bushels of oats are being shipped each week from this country to Europe, mostly to Liverpool, and 8,000,000 bushels of wheat are being shipped abroad, mostly to Liverpool. The great speculators and market raiders, who make prices what they will, are buying oats from the farmers in this State at this time at about an average of 25 cents a bushel, and wheat running on average over the State from 76 to 80 cents a bushel, barely covering the cost of production where the yield is good, when the high cost of living is considered in connection with the high price of labor. What is this grain worth in Liverpool, where most of it goes? Here are the figures; read them and study them. They will be a revelation to those who believed that South Dakota's farmers were reveling in the fat of the land when they raised big crops:

American wheat, No. 1 northern, Duluth, in Liverpool	11s. 3d.
This reduced to our money means that 100 pounds is worth	$2.70
No. 1 northern, Duluth, Sept. 10, same date, per 100 pounds	1.56
Spread between Duluth and Liverpool	1.14
Every known cost of handling, including 2 cents commission	.52
Clear gouge over all cost of handling and commission, hundredweight	.62

Or 37 cents a bushel, or 46 per cent of the selling price the farmer gets.

Oats, American, Liverpool, Sept. 10, 45 pounds	4s. 5d.
Reduced to our money, this makes 75 cents per bushel of 32 pounds, or for 100 pounds, Liverpool	$2.35
Oats, Duluth, Sept. 10, 34 cents a bushel, or for 100 pounds	1.06
Spread between Duluth and Liverpool on oats	1.29
Every legitimate cost of handling, with 2 cents commission	.52
Clear gouge over all costs and commission, per 100 pounds	.77

Thus for each bushel of oats the South Dakota farmer gets 26 cents and the market raiders 24 cents, or 92 per cent of the price the farmer gets over all costs and commissions.

Selling 40,000,000 bushels of wheat on this basis, the loss will be to the farmers of the State	$14,400,000
On oats	20,000,000
On barley (the drop has been 25 cents)	5,750,000
Or a total of	40,150,000

Every dollar of this money should be of right in the pockets of the farmers of this State. It would enable them to pay their bills, build new homes, educate their children, buy more automobiles and pianos, improve their farms with better buildings, and enable them to enjoy some of the luxuries of life of which they are now denied.

The remedy for this condition must bring about the erection of great terminal elevators, where part of the grain coming onto the market at this time may be stored and cash drawn against elevator receipts. This would prevent market flooding and bring about steady prices. It would likewise prevent the boosting of prices and cinching of consumers when the bulk of the grain gets in the hands of speculators.

If the Canadian Government can build elevators for its farmers—though it has not gone far enough yet—surely this Government can. If this Government can build warehouses for the makers of whisky, it can do it for the grain raisers, and thereby help nearly all of the people.

"OATS TOO HIGH."

Note the reply of the American Cooperative Journal, in its issue of September, to Mr. Beckwith, the manager of a farmers' elevator at Gowrie, Iowa, who complains of 20 cents drop in oats just as the farmers began marketing. The Journal tells the complaining manager that there is no combine, but that oats were too high, because shorts had to cover, and that a slump was inevitable.

The mighty combine is now more powerful, more absolute in its sway, more unmindful of the rights of both consumer and producer alike than at any other time in the history of its record-making career. Only the record of the transactions of wheat and oats is given here, as barley prices are not quoted on foreign markets; but everybody knows that as the selling season approached the raiders knocked the price of barley 25 cents per bushel. As to corn prices, the far South will soon begin selling new corn. The high price a short time ago was above 80 cents per bushel in Chicago; but wait till the great Northwest begins marketing, and then compare the price with even the price that prevails now.

STORE WHISKY; WHY NOT WHEAT?

The United States Government for nearly half a century furnished warehouses to accommodate all of the whisky produced in the country. Why not furnish warehouses for a very small part of the grain produced? It is believed such would largely remedy the evils complained of. Dealing in phantom grain should also be prohibited by law. The practice is much more pernicious in its results than was the operation of the Louisiana Lottery.

In closing, it may be said that the beating down of the markets when farmers are marketing heavily is not necessarily chargeable to the ordinary commission merchant, who simply handles consigned grain. Rather it is the great millionaire manipulators and speculators who constitute the Elevator Trust and act in combination and collusion. The octopus controls all boards of trade and chambers of commerce, however.

Every market in the United States is in the grasp of those manipulators, whose organization is perfect, whose combine is complete in its monopoly. They control many of the great newspapers of the country, and their sway is absolute over all trade journals, whose part in the transaction usually is to get their cash from the market manipulators through advertising, get their readers among the farmers, whom they strive to chloroform while the skinning process is going on.

WHEAT AND ITS PRICE.

[By Hon. J. E. Kelley, former Member of Congress.]

Much is being written these days to prove that the world markets are being flooded as a result of a tremendous yield of wheat from nearly all quarters of the globe. Most of this is written in an effort to justify the low price that is and has been paid for wheat in this country since the first arrival of winter wheat on the American markets.

In my article of September 10 it was shown that the great speculators who control prices in this country were then taking a toll from the American wheat producer of 24 cents a bushel on oats and 37 cents a bushel on wheat, over and above all costs and commissions on the amount shipped to foreign countries.

The following figures, compiled from the market reports of the Sioux City Tribune of September 29, 1915, show what toll the market raiders were taking from producers on the amount exported on that date:

"LIVERPOOL GRAIN."

Wheat, No. 2 hard, winter, American, per 100 pounds	11s. 10½d.
Reduced to our money this means, do	$2.85
Wheat, Chicago, Sept. 29, No. 2 hard, winter, $1.04 per bushel, per 100 pounds	1.73
Spread between Chicago and Liverpool, do	1.12
Cost of handling: Ocean rate, 43 cents per hundred; insurance, 2 cents; water rate to New York, 8 cents; exporter's commission, 3 cents; elevator charge, 1 cent; total, hundredweight	.56
Speculator's toll, per hundred pounds	.56

Or a shade over 33 cents per bushel.

The above figures prove a condition of affairs entirely beyond all justification; nor is it because of a flood of grain either in this country or in Europe.

The best authorities now estimate a shortage in this country, as compared with last year, in wheat that by any possibility can be made into flour, of 85,000,000 bushels; as the estimated amount of winter wheat now unfit for milling purposes is 160,000,000 bushels. France is short above 85,000,000 bushels also, and Russia is no nearer European markets than ever.

Nor is any such thing as overproduction of wheat reflected in either the demand or the price in Europe.

Broomhall reports as follows: "Liverpool market displayed a decidedly firm undertone. Foreign arrivals were reported as inadequate; nervousness was much in evidence. European crop accounts were disappointing and stocks are not accumulating. Prices are high in Holland and importations will soon commence. Roumania was reported as notifying producers they must not send further consignments out of the country; this is to avoid future scarcity. Port stocks in the United Kingdom, as officially compiled up to September 10, for wheat and flour show 16,100,000 bushels, as against 17,600,000 bushels last month and 24,000,000 last year."

Thus it is apparent that there is no glutting in European markets, but, on the contrary, prices are higher there, demand good, and bidding and competition keen. Neither are American markets flooded, but the greedy speculators who fix prices here, regardless of supply and demand or anything else, save their desire for ill-gotten gain, were prepared for a monster scoop this fall and they are not to be beaten out of it. The toll on oats is nearly the same as indicated in my letter of September 10—from 20 to 24 cents per bushel above all costs and commissions on the amount shipped to Liverpool. Exports to foreign countries continue about the same as earlier in the month. Since July 1 this country exported of wheat 65,600,000 bushels. On this amount there has been taken from the American farmers, based on the Liverpool price of wheat, $22,100,000, after paying all costs of handling and reasonable commissions.

South Dakota's portion of this money should be kept in this State. Imagine the thrill that business would feel in this State could our farmers have the money that is rightfully theirs.

More automobiles would go out; more farmers would come to town to buy what would be needed, and merchants would need additional clerks to wait on the rush of customers instead of additional collection agencies.

Farmers should organize to protect themselves against the organized market raiders. Elect only men to Congress who favor the building of great terminal elevators and men to the legislature who favor State storage elevators.

In the interest of all classes in this State, the above-proven robberies must be stopped.

THE SHIPPING BILL AND THE FARMERS.

[By former Congressman John E. Kelley, Pierre, S. D., chairman of Farmers Northwest Legislative Committee.]

We have heard but little lately about the defeat of the shipping bill that the President tried so hard to get through Congress during the closing days of the last session. Its defeat, however, was a serious blow to the farmers of this country, nor was there one substantial reason why it should be defeated, other than the Shipping Trust so ordered. Senator La Follette, as well as the President, should be given credit for the splendid efforts he made to secure the passage of this bill, the defeat of which cost the agricultural interests of the country a sum not less than $100,000,000.

Ocean rates on grain previous to the war averaged about 3 cents per bushel. The average rate since the beginning of the war would run about 30 cents per bushel, running as high as 37 cents, and at present—the last investigation made by this writer—24 cents to British ports per bushel. But who are the men most responsible for the defeat of the shipping bill during the late Congress? There are two of them—very prominent at the present time in the councils of the Nation—Senator CLARKE of Arkansas, president pro tem of the Senate, and ALBERT B. CUMMINS, senior Senator from the great agricultural State of Iowa and now a candidate for the Presidency.

Let the southern cotton grower remember Senator CLARKE while they are paying their hard-earned dollars into the coffers of the Shipping Trust; let the northern grain grower remember Senator CUMMINS as chief among the men who defeated the administration shipping bill, and thereby handed them a lemon that cost them over $100,000,000.

When farmers show politicians that they are wide awake to their interests, the same as other business men do, such acts as CUMMINS and CLARKE performed in this instance will not happen, and not before will they cease.

About 400,000,000 bushels of grain has been exported since the defeat of the shipping bill, so that 25 cents per bushel would easily make the hundred million dollars; and all students know that the price of the amount consumed at home was affected by the exorbitant ocean rates as well as the amount sent abroad.

Grain prices throughout the world have been the highest known for 40 years. Yet, owing to the Shipping Trust and the American Terminal Elevator Trust, the American farmers have been selling, in many instances, below the cost of production. Oats sold throughout the Northwest for more than 100 days after the opening of the markets this year for 25 to 26 cents per bushel, and in many instances even less. All of this time, with the exception of just a few days, American oats sold in Liverpool 74½ to 75 cents for 32 pounds. New clipped, American Liverpool, 45 pounds, 4s. 4½d. to 4s. 5d. Thus, while American oats sold in Liverpool for 75 cents per bushel and the American farmers were getting at the same time but an average of 25 cents, who got the remaining 50 cents per bushel? Here are the figures: The market raiders got 23 cents per bushel of it and the Shipping Trust took 16 cents per bushel in addition often to the regular rates before the war. The other 11 cents per bushel were absorbed in local elevator rates, lake rates, and insurance, overseas and locally. The Government furnishes the insurance, which has averaged 1 cent to British ports down to one-half and one-fourth to nonbelligerent countries. So that insurance is low and within reach of all.

Accordingly, while the consumer in England paid an average of 75 cents per bushel for American oats, the American farmers got an average for the first 100 days following the opening of the market this fall of 25 cents per bushel, or but one-third of the real value of their crops.

Of the 50 cents per bushel taken from the farmers, from 11 to 13 cents only could by any possibility be fairly charged, even during war times, to legitimate expenses and legitimate profits. The remaining 37 cents per bushel represents clear plunder divided up between the American grain speculators and the foreign shipping trust above indicated.

A short time before the war the Minneapolis Journal made a comment upon the fact that the spread between the price of wheat in Liverpool and Minneapolis was the exact cost of transportation and commissions, and was given at 12 cents per bushel lake freight from Duluth.

WHEAT, OATS, AND BARLEY ADVANCE.

On the 27th day of November the spread between Duluth and Liverpool was 71 cents per bushel, being worth in Liverpool $1.73, or 12s. In Duluth (same grade), $1.02; spread, 71 cents; fair cost of handling, 17 cents; which leaves 54 cents.

A fair price for handling wheat between Duluth and Liverpool on that date, allowing big advances on account of the war, would be:

	Cents.
Lake rates	4
Elevator	1
Commission	1
Insurance, local and overseas	2
Emergencies	1
Ocean rates (double peace rate)	8
Total	17

Yet we find that 54 cents in addition to this sum was taken and was divided between the terminal market raiders and the foreign shipping trust as follows: The rate charged by the Shipping Trust that day from New York to British ports was 14d. per bushel, 28 cents. Here was 20 cents clear plunder taken from farmers. But the American terminal market raiders distanced the foreign ship owners when it came to plunder to the extent of 69 per cent, for the raiders took on that day, over and above every known cost of handling, fixing the calculation on the price of wheat that day between Duluth and Liverpool, 34 cents per bushel. The price the farmers got the 27th of November in Aberdeen, S. Dak., for No. 1 wheat was 85 cents; accordingly the terminal market raiders took, as a clear toll over all costs of handling, 40 per cent of the price the South Dakota farmer got; and the raiders and the Shipping Trust together took, as a clear toll over all legitimate costs of handling, 63 per cent of the selling price the South Dakota farmer received, an unjustifiable loss of 54 cents per bushel.

But wheat and oats are getting well out of the hands of farmers now, and into the hands of the market raiders. Accordingly, watch them soar. Yet, the increase in price between November 27 and December 18 in Liverpool was but 6 cents per bushel. The advance in price in Duluth, Chicago, or Minneapolis has been 26 cents per bushel.

AFTER THE CORN GROWER AND THE CONSUMER NOW.

Now, since wheat, oats, and barley have largely passed into the hands of speculators, they have advanced in price rapidly, but the corn grower—he is now marketing heavily—they are after him.

Corn, American mixed, new, Liverpool, Dec. 28	9s. 8d.
Reduced to American money this means 56 pounds is worth	$1.30
Chicago, No. 6 mixed, new, Dec. 28	.65
Spread between Chicago and Liverpool	.65

If this isn't robbery, what is it? When farmers become sufficiently intelligent to organize, and place tried and true men at the head of their organizations—not mere puppets of market raiders and gamblers—they will put a stop to such robberies, but not till then.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman from Minnesota used all of his time?

Mr. STEENERSON. I have.

Mr. MOON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 37 minutes.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the bill under consideration there are carried appropriations for the support of the Post Office Department for the ensuing fiscal year to the amount of $320,509,879. In the discussion that has gone on here for 16 hours I have heard no criticism that amounted to anything in particular with respect to the amount appropriated for any particular item in the bill. I take this as evidence strong and indisputable that the House is satisfied that the work of the Post Office Committee has been well done. We have heard a great deal of discussion on other subjects, the War Department, the Navy Department, which is all very well, but now that we have a great bill here, which is made up after weeks and months of labor and effort, we find no criticism of the items of appropriations carried in the bill. The committee was careful, it exerted itself to bring into the House a bill that would command the confidence of the House. We believe that we have done that. There are items in the bill, in the way of proposed new legislation, that doubtless will provoke discussion when they are reached, but I believe there are only two of those that are calculated to provoke serious discussion—one the bonding proposition of postal employees, and the other the proposed change in the railway mail pay basis. I shall not discuss those matters until they are reached for consideration, but I want to say that not only have we a great Postal Service, but the people of this country demand it.

In the 17 years that I have been here I have seen the appropriations grow from $100,000,000 to the present sum of $320,000,000. It costs a great deal of money to give to the people of the United States the best postal service in the world, and they have that service. No country in the world has ever had as good service as the people of the United States have to-day. This is true, and the man who doubts it and who thinks there is room for retrenchment or reform can go among the people and find out, and he will find himself vastly mistaken. I believe the item in the bill that has carried the most criticism is that in reference to the Rural Delivery Service. This is a great service. I have seen it grow from the very small appropriation of $150,000 to the present sum of $53,000,000.

There has been criticism of the department because a new departure has been made in some respects, which I think is only by way of experiment. What the intention of the officials of the department is in full I do not know, but I am satisfied of this, that two systems of conducting the Rural Delivery Service will not operate successfully in this country—the automobile contract service and the horse-drawn vehicle service by postal employees. One or the other must prevail. It may be true that in some cases an automobile service is proper and that it will give effective service, but when you consider that the seasons vary, the conditions of the roads change in the various months of the year—winter, summer, spring, and fall—one is bound to conclude that automobile service, except on hard roads, can not succeed the year round. That has been my view all of the time—where there are good roads, macadam roads, sand and clay roads, kept up from the 1st of January to the 1st of next January, then the automobile service can be made successful, but even then there would be drawbacks.

We know that it is almost impossible to run an automobile continuously without a breakdown. In fact, I do not think it possible to run one very long without some mishap occurring. We know that with the horse-drawn vehicle on a standard route you will have service that is practically the same the year around—in winter a little slower, in summer a little more expeditious, but generally speaking the same—and I submit that this country can not have two systems of Rural Delivery Service delivery. I stand for the horse-drawn vehicle. I have said so repeatedly. I have helped in the past during my service here to build up the service, to make it the very best, to aid it, to improve it; and I have stated on this floor that the man who lays a heavy hand on the service and renders it inefficient will suffer. I made that statement before, and I repeat it now. I want to state that I think a great deal of the criticism made here is unjust. I believe that when the final analysis is made it will be seen that some of these criticisms are unfounded. I am satisfied in my own mind from assurances that I have that no extraordinary or unusual departure from the horse-drawn vehicle service will be made unless that service is satisfactory to the people and to the Congressman of the district. I think that is as it should be. The people who have had rural service at their doors for years and years do not think they should be deprived of it. It becomes, in their opinion, a vested right. Of course in law it is not, but in practice they so consider it, and you can not convince one that such is not the case. I believe that in the future there will be no just cause for complaint along this line of substituting automobile service for horse-drawn service. I have some assurances that satisfy me that action will be taken, action looking to remedy what is now considered by many to be an injustice to the patrons of many routes in the United States.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Has the gentleman any authority for saying that the routes that have been rearranged and reestablished will be changed back to a satisfactory service to the people?

Mr. FINLEY. I think if the gentleman will read the letter that the chairman of the committee read into the RECORD the other day he will find that that letter carries that inference; and I will say this, that I have it that wherever the service has been rearranged to the detriment of the service inspectors will be sent there and the service made as complete as possible.

Mr. DOWELL. And that is to be done in all places where objections have been made?

Mr. FINLEY. Well, I can not answer for that, but I will say to the gentleman that is my understanding.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. When an inspector is sent there, as the gentleman suggests, and makes a report not in accord with what the Congressman who takes an interest in the subject knows to be the facts, which one is going to prevail with the department?

Mr. FINLEY. I can only say this, that in my case the Congressman, inconspicuous as he is, has always prevailed. That is all the answer I can make.

Mr. DOWELL. May I ask one more question?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. DOWELL. Has the gentleman been consulted with reference to all the changes which have been made in the gentleman's district?

Mr. FINLEY. I have not.

Mr. DOWELL. Have the people on the routes been consulted with reference to the change?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say this to the gentleman, that in my early days here, when the rural service was being established, I gave the establishment of routes my personal attention, and I saw to it, as far as a man could see—so far, at least, as I could—that they were laid out properly and that they served as many people as possible, so that the very best service to the community should be given, and there have been no changes I know of in my congressional district. But I want to say this, that I did not leave this matter solely to the inspectors themselves, but I gave it my personal attention, as far as I could, with a view of having the service established where it should be established. Perhaps I have succeeded, perhaps I have not.

Mr. DOWELL. May I ask the gentleman one more question?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. DOWELL. Can the gentleman suggest any method of securing this good service he has suggested, where he is not consulted, and where the people who receive mail on the routes are not consulted, and where the change is made without reference to the wishes of the people who receive their mail?

Mr. FINLEY. I think in future that complaint will not be made. I think that in future the people will be consulted and the Congressmen will be. That is my belief. Now, as I stated, I looked after the matter in its inception in the establishment of the service, and I attribute to that more than anything else the fact that I have had no trouble with the routes in my congressional district. That district has not the greatest number of routes of any, even in the South—not nearly so—but I did not ask for service where it does not come up to the standard.

Now, with respect to the Rural Delivery Service my belief is this: That a common standard should be fixed, it should be settled, and when a community comes up to that standard they should be given the service, and whenever you do not do that, then you get into trouble; and wherever you place one route on top of another or give more routes to one community than the people of that community need for efficient service, then trouble follows. So I believe in a standard route. I believe that when this course is followed out there will be practically no trouble. Now, there have been criticisms; many of them are well founded, and I want to say here now that I usually talk plainly. I understand there are some gentlemen down here called post-office inspectors in the department who have been busily engaged with a pencil and paper and rural-route maps spread out before them rearranging routes in various portions of the country. I absolutely condemn that practice, absolutely. [Applause.]

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true, as the gentleman is informed, that this has been done, and that the routes have been changed and reestablished by these so-called inspectors figuring these routes from their office here in Washington?

Mr. FINLEY. I have such information; and I am sure that there is at least one man down there engaged in this work whom I would not want in my congressional district at all, or, rather, I have been informed he was engaged in that work. And I want to say, gentlemen, the inspectors I know of who are engaged in that work, some two or three, are all Republicans.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. I will.

Mr. CRISP. Are there any 50-mile motor routes established in the gentleman's district?

Mr. FINLEY. No.

Mr. CRISP. Have any been placed in operation in South Carolina?

Mr. FINLEY. I am not prepared to speak as to that, but I know of none.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman has been more fortunate than I have; I have 21 of them now in operation.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say this, that the roads in my congressional district are of such a character and the topography of the country is such that it is impossible to operate motor service for a majority of the months in the year. Now, that being true, there is no place for a motor service in the congressional district I represent, and I take it that is largely true of South Carolina.

Mr. CRISP. We think in Georgia that is true. We have no graded roads, but nevertheless and notwithstanding our opinion they have been established.

Mr. FINLEY. Well, I am sure the motor service would not operate in the fifth district on many routes. It could not be made successful. Now, some criticism was made here, rather well founded, I admit that, but I do not believe that in the future there will be ground for this criticism. I have information that in the future no set of post-office inspectors located down here in the department shall take a pen and paper and a rural-route map and relocate routes. Such is my information, and such is my belief, that before a change is made a post-office inspector shall go on the ground and investigate and inspect and make his report, and that is as it should be.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are other matters in the bill that I would like to take up if time and the condition of my throat permitted, but I shall not. I take it that whatever real debate comes on this bill will come under the five-minute rule, and it will come when the new legislation is reached. The new legislation, in my opinion, is unobjectionable, except as to two items, which are objected to by some people, the bonding proposition and the mail pay. The other items are largely in aid of good administration, and should be enacted into law without question, and I believe there will be no opposition.

I believe that the bonding proposition is good in the main. I am not so well prepared to give an opinion on that as I am on the railway mail pay. I shall make no set speech on that at this time, because twice before I have debated this question. We passed a separate bill similar to the one we have tacked on here, and some people call it a rider. I remember when the first one was passed. It went to the Senate. Well, the bill did not come back here. Congress died and the bill died with it. In the last Congress we placed it on the appropriation bill, determined that it should be considered as far as we could have it determined. It went to the Senate. It was a short session of Congress, and Congress was tied up with the shipbuilding bill and the Indian appropriation bill. And while this Post Office bill got out of conference, the conference report was never considered in the Senate and the Post Office bill died. And, as I take it, the question is better known to you—the Members of the House are better acquainted with its provisions—and I want to say it will do no harm to the railroads; but I will say this: It involves the life of the parcel post, and the man who has studied this question is bound to come to the same conclusion and make that same statement.

So, Mr. Chairman, this is all I care to say, I believe, just now, and I yield back to the chairman the time I have not used.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina yields back 1 minute.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

For rent of suitable buildings for the use of the Post Office Department, including the mail-bag-repair shop, lock-repair shop, and the Division of Equipment, $32,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. STEENERSON. I reserve the point of order. I desire the chairman to explain the first paragraph. I believe it is legislation.

Mr. MOON. There is nothing in that except that we substitute for the words "Division of Supplies" the words "Division of Equipment."

Mr. STEENERSON. I think the House ought to understand. I just reserved a point of order.

Mr. MOON. The department thought that was a better word.

Mr. STEENERSON. The matter was taken up at the hearings, was it not?

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes. I hope the gentleman does not want me to go through and explain all the hearings.

Mr. STEENERSON. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota withdraws the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of post-office inspectors: For salaries of 15 inspectors in charge of divisions, at $3,000 each; 30 inspectors, at $2,400 each; 20 inspectors, at $2,250 each; 32 inspectors, at $2,100 each (an increase of 2 submitted in lieu of 2 assistant superintendents, Railway Mail Service, at $2,350 each, to be transferred from the office of the Second Assistant); 20 inspectors, at $2,000 each; 30 inspectors, at $1,900 each; 90 inspectors, at $1,800 each; 60 inspectors, at $1,700 each; 60 inspectors, at $1,600 each; and 65 inspectors, at $1,500 each; in all, $783,700.

Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, while this Post Office bill is being discussed I want to call the attention of the Members of this House to the rural mail service in Massachusetts.

The Post Office Department, and especially that branch which is under the direction of Mr. Blakslee, is giving the country the worst administration in its history. [Applause.]

The department has come into my district and without thoroughly investigating conditions has so demoralized the rural mail service that it has caused inconvenience to hundreds of patrons.

The rural routes of this country should not be impaired, neither should the service be crippled.

The department says that it is making these changes to save money. There are hundreds of ways where the department can better save money than at the expense of the farmer.

Included in my district is a rich agricultural section.

The rural routes were originally established after a personal examination by an inspector. The people were consulted, the conditions studied, and their wishes were considered.

As the result of the high grade of efficiency attained by the Rural Mail Service in the past, the alert and businesslike farmer, encouraged by the Government, took advantage of the opportunities offered by the Parcel Post System. He would ship his eggs, butter, chickens, fruit, and vegetables direct to the consumer. It was very easy to receive his mail in the morning, get his wares together, and send them out in the same evening.

But what has happened? This industry has been practically wiped out. Through a thoroughly impractical retrenchment plan many routes in my district have been consolidated with those of adjoining towns, causing untold inconveniences to hundreds of patrons, besides placing additional as well as unjust burdens upon the rural mail carriers.

A great many people of my district have been compelled to go without any mail service as the result of these changes. Many more have to walk from a mile to a mile and a half and then wait for their carrier in order to get their mail.

Town officers who receive the official mail of a town are compelled to either change their post-office address to another town or else walk down to the post office for their mail.

In one section of my district, in Medfield, the prominent business men and farmers of the town got together and hired the former letter carrier to go to the post office and get their mail. They do this rather than to wait hours for the regular mail delivery.

In Waltham, Mass., several hundred people enjoyed an afternoon mail delivery and as a result had built up a very profitable parcel-post business. The Post Office Department wiped out this route and the people suffer.

What I object to principally is the method employed by the Post Office Department in making these changes. Instead of sending field inspectors to the towns to investigate local conditions, an inspector sits down with a map in front of him in Washington and makes the changes. What does this clerk know about local conditions?

When one visits the Post Office Department to seek relief he is told that the people should not complain if their mail was three to five hours late. We are told that they should not complain if they have to change their post-office address, as they are fortunate to get any mail delivery to their homes at all.

I had always believed that the department in charge of our mails desired to encourage and secure the greatest efficiency possible. This is not being done and the Postmaster General has made a dismal failure of his job.

There is very little that we can do here, but the rural residents in my district are anxiously waiting until next fall when they will give the power to a Republican to name a new Postmaster General. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I believe that the residents of a rural community are just as much entitled to efficient mail service as those in city districts.

They pay their share of the taxes and therefore they are justified in resenting the outrageous changes made by the Post Office Department.

I want to say, if my time has not expired, that I believe that these changes in the rural districts have been made without any consideration for the people that live in these districts.

I believe that these changes have not been carried out on business principles. They have been carried out on a "guess and begorry" plan. These changes have been made by theorists and with the aid of maps, and are not practical. No one in a private business would dare make the changes in this manner, for if he did he would go into bankruptcy before he had a chance to finish what he had started. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimouse consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask for this extension in order to insert some communications relative to the rural situation, as follows:

NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS., November 4, 1915.

Hon. ALBERT S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I desire to call to your attention an order which has been issued from the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General on November 1, which provides the discontinuing of service over rural route No. 1 of the Sherborn, Mass., post office.

As the Representative from that district, I appeal to you to either rescind that order or to extend the discontinuing of said service until a thorough and proper inspection of the conditions can be made.

I do not believe that it is the intention of your department to cripple the mail service in any town. In this instance the only beneficiary will be the postmaster of Framingham, whose salary will be increased by the corresponding increase in his receipts.

A delegation, which includes the board of selectmen and many prominent citizens, has just called on me, protesting against the proposed change as recommended by your department. According to the new schedule which your office has issued, it will mean a hardship to many residents of that town. On a great many streets there will be no service at all and on a great many streets people will be required to walk from one-half to three-quarters of a mile in order to secure their mail. It will also be necessary at certain places to have a larger number of mail boxes, which in itself will be obnoxious looking.

Will you kindly advise me just why this change is being made?

Not only will the service over route No. 1 of Sherborn be discontinued, but the present carrier, Frank H. Goulding, a man whose recommendations and his average mark in the civil service were of the best, will also have his services discontinued. In his place the postmaster of Framingham is to appoint a carrier. In fairness to Mr. Goulding, if such an appointment is to be made, is he not entitled to that position?

Should you desire a petition, the board of selectmen are ready and willing to start one in the town, and promise to bring in the name of every citizen protesting against the action of your department.

Will you kindly advise me at once on the question?

Yours, very truly,

———.

NOVEMBER 6, 1915.

Hon. WILLIAM H CARTER,
Needham Heights, Mass.

MY DEAR MR. CARTER: In answer to your letter of the 4th instant, which the Postmaster General has referred to me, in which you request to be advised concerning reasons leading up to the discontinuance of rural route No. 1, Sherborn, Mass., as ordered effective November 15, 1915, and request that action under said order be suspended until the matter may be further investigated, I beg to state that in connection with a recent review of the service in Middlesex County it was found that by a more systematic arrangement of the routes through the elimination of excessive duplication and unnecessary retracting it was possible to cover the territory with seven less routes, and in the carrying out of this plan it seemed desirable to dispense with the services of one carrier at Sherborn and provide for the patrons through a consolidation of that route with the service from Framingham.

The changes in the vicinity of Framingham and Sherborn are in no wise radical, or is there any reason to believe that the patrons will be seriously inconvenienced thereby. In fact, according to the reports received, only three families will be required to relocate their boxes, the farthest of which is a quarter of a mile, and with the exception of the families residing on the road between Weston Avenue and Sherborn post office all will receive direct service through the latter office without having to change their post-office address.

In view of the foregoing facts, and in the absence of any evidence tending to show that the proposed arrangement is impracticable, this office would not be warranted in postponing the institution of the new arrangement, but all complaints presented will receive very careful consideration, with a view to taking such action as is found to be warranted.

I may add that the extension of the service from Framingham, so as to take over the route from Sherborn, does not involve the appointment of an additional carrier at that office, as intimated in your letter. Were such the case, I should be glad to consider the matter of transferring Mr. Goulding to such point or to any other vacancy in the rural-carrier force which may occur during the ensuing year, should he make application for reinstatement at the time of such vacancy.

In conclusion, permit me to assure you, and through you the patrons of the service in this territory, that by the proposed revision it is not the department's purpose to injure or curtail the rural service, but, on the contrary, to increase and extend the service in rural communities, so that the best service practicable may be afforded to the greatest number of patrons, and in pursuance of this policy I shall be glad to consider any suggestions which you may care to submit looking to the establishment of additional rural service in your district now without such service.

Sincerely, yours,

J. I. BLAKSLEE.
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, November 15, 1915.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CARTER,
Needham Heights, Mass.

MY DEAR MR. CARTER: Referring to your letters of November 9 and 11, addressed to Mr. Warner, which have been presented by him, together with protests against the discontinuance of route No. 1, Sherborn, Mass., and the dismissal of Frank A. Goulding, carrier thereon, and acknowledging your letter addressed to me under the same date concerning this matter, I beg to invite your atttention to my letter of November 6, copy herewith, in reply to your communication addressed to the Postmaster General under date of November 4, setting forth in detail the facts concerning the discontinuance of this service.

It appears from the subsequent correspondence that the main objection against the discontinuance of the route arises through an apprehension that this action presaged the discontinuance of the post office at Sherborn. This is not the case, and to allay any possible misapprehension along this line instructions have been given the postmaster at Framingham to have the carrier on arriving at Sherborn deposit in that office uncanceled such mail as he has collected up to that point as can be advanced in dispatch thereby.

As to the discontinuance of the services of Carrier Goulding, this action should not be construed as any reflection upon the carrier, who I should be very glad to retain in the service had there been a vacancy at the time to which he might have been transferred. However, he is eligible to reinstatement to any vacancy which may occur within the county during the period of one year from the 15th instant, and in the event of receipt of an application from him for reinstatement at the time of a vacancy it will be given very careful consideration in connection with any others which may also be presented at that time.

Sincerely, yours,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

SHERBORN, MASS., December 15, 1915.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CARTER,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CARTER: I have read copies of the two letters written to you by Hon. J. S. Blakslee, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and it is quite apparent that the official in question misunderstands the conditions that control and the situation that obtains at the present time in Sherborn.

In his letter of November 6 he writes of a "more systematic arrangement," and declares that there is no reason to believe "that the patrons will be seriously inconvenienced thereby." My answer is that our people are seriously inconvenienced. Facts outweigh theories, and we who receive the mail under the present very "systematic (?) arrangement" are daily witnesses to the truth of my statement. He further asserts that "according to reports, only three families will be required to relocate to boxes," referring to those on Pleasant Street, who for the first time in 13 years are thus inconvenienced. How about the families on Bullard Street? Was there a report on that street? The statement that "with the exception of families residing on the road between Western Avenue and Sherborn post office, all will receive direct service through the latter office without having to change their post-office address," sounds queer and very inaccurate to the residents on Main Street, north of Dowes's corner, and the residents on Main Street, more than 15 families in all, who are put into the Framingham office and must change their address from Sherborn to Framingham. A mile only from the local post office, on the principal street and in the most populous part of the town, they can not now get their evening mail at the local office. It is very evident that the "reports" received by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General were misleading, to say the least. "In view of the foregoing facts, and in the absence of any evidence," he refused to postpone inaugurating the new arrangements. I think I have shown that the "foregoing" are not "facts," and I ask how "evidence" could be presented? When the route now mutilated was arranged—some of it when Senator JOHN W. WEEKS was our Representative in Congress—our people were consulted, our conditions carefully studied, and our wishes considered. So far as I am able to ascertain, not a citizen of Sherborn was consulted before the present plan was outlined. Without our knowledge the arrangements were made, a peremptory order for the change was issued, and we are then refused a postponement because we have not presented "evidence," although we did file protests signed by nearly every citizen of Sherborn. If one of the inspectors will confer with our people, we'll produce the evidence.

"It is not the department's purpose to injure or curtail the rural service," he continues. The service in Sherborn has been injured and has been curtailed. He asks "for suggestions looking to the establishment of additional service in your—Mr. CARTER'S—territory now without such service." My suggestion is that he give (restore) that service to the residents of Pleasant and Bullard Streets in Sherborn.

In his letter of November 15 he says, "the main objection against the discontinuance of the route arises through an assumption that the action presaged the discontinuance of the post office in Sherborn," and declared that certain mail gathered by the carrier is to be delivered uncancelled at the Sherborn office; but he forgets that by the present arrangement all the Everett Street mail, much on Main Street, and all collected after leaving the office on return from Farm Road goes to Framingham. To kill by starvation is a slower process than to kill by the bullet, but none the less cruel and none the less sure.

Maple Street is also Framinghamized. On that street resides the secretary of our board of selectmen. All our town letterheads, etc., bear the imprint Sherborn. It is important that we get both the morning and the evening mail. We don't propose to change our town name or town literature to Framingham. The result is that our secretary and other residents on Maple Street forego the rural delivery and get their mail at the local office. And still we are assured that no one "outside of three families" is inconvenienced. Our case is different from those cities in the Boston postal district. There the mail is addressed, not to Boston, but to the particular city—Malden, Everett, Newton, as the case may be. The city does not lose its civic individuality.

It is to be presumed that the department having in charge the United States mails desires to secure and encourage the largest possible efficiency, and that the quickest possible delivery of mail marks a large part of that efficiency. The convenience, satisfaction, and accommodation of mail recipients constitutes the real test. By that test the efficiency of our rural-mail delivery has been impaired 50 per cent. The primitive is reinstalled and the modern is relegated to the scrap-heap. Because our mail carrier desired to give us the best possible service he purchased an automobile and was able to reduce the time in going over the route one-half. For this enterprise he is punished, or so it seems to us. We now have a one-horse cart delivery, and the accompanying schedule shows how the Post Office Department has slowed up its service. I notice that in the South the carriers' routes are being motorized and the department has been sharply criticized therefor, the roads there being bad. Putting auto delivery on bad roads in the South and West, and displacing that same delivery in Massachusetts where the roads are good, seems a bit strange to the uninitiated.

But that isn't all. The department has, so far as our mail service is concerned, cut the town in two. It has halved it right on its main street and its most populous village only a mile distant from the office. It prevents these people, thus Framinghamized, from getting their evening mail at the office; and it is now impossible to get any mail until the next day—the Boston evening papers and the nearby papers that contain our local news.

Now, contrast the present delivery with the former. Bear in mind that I am in no way criticizing the carrier, Mr. Hollis. He has been given a route altogether too long and has had placed on his shoulders a burden too great for any man. He does the best he can; if the patrons suffer the fault is not his but the authority that imposed the task upon him. Take note also that the schedule is a fair-weather schedule; what it will be during the winter storms and spring thaws I hate to contemplate. The delivery begins late and lateness is multiplied by lateness with every mile covered. In this schedule I am naming only a few mail recipients at different points on the route; of course, all intervening points show corresponding difference in time between the old and new schedules.

Our last morning mail arrives at our local office at 8.30 a. m. Mr. Goulding left the office at 9 a. m. Mr. Hollis leaves at 10.30 a. m. He would leave at an even later hour but for the fact that our local postmistress routes and bundles the mail, which, I understand, is really not a part of her official duty. As it is, the mail remains in the office two hours after arrival before the carrier takes it from the office.

The first stop is at the house of Norman B. Douglass, who is within a half a minute's walk of the station where the mail arrives and half a mile distant from the post office. The mail which he sees leave the station at 8.25 a. m. he now receives by carrier 10.45 a. m. Mr. Goulding delivered it at 9.10 a. m. My own mail (Lake Street) I previously received at 9.45 a. m.; now at 11 to 11.15 a. m. Note also that Mr. Goulding, before coming down Lake Street, had to cover Main and Everett Streets to the Natick line, now set off to the Framingham route.

Oscar H. Howe, at the extreme south of Sherborn, previously received his mail at 10.45 a. m.; now at 12.05 p. m.

Milo F. Campbell, on South Main Street, a mile from the local office, previously received mail at 11 a. m.; now at 12.30 p. m.

Rev. H. E. Bray, on Farm Road, half a mile from local office, previously received mail at 10 a. m.; now at 1 p. m.

James F. Leland, Southwest Sherborn, previously received his mail at 11.45 a. m.; now at 3 p. m. I am told that his son mounts his bicycle in the morning, goes 5 miles to the Framingham High School, attends all the sessions of that school, returns home, and arrives there before his parents receive their morning mail.

Take another case, Mr. Leslie Philbrook, on Western Avenue—and all along that avenue are in like condition. He is less than a mile from Framingham, from which point our carrier makes his start in the morning. Previously he received his mail at 11 to 11.15 a. m.; now he gets it at 4 p. m. And this point illustrates pointedly how little consideration the planners of the present "systematic arrangements" gave to the convenience and needs of mail recipients. Mr. Philbrook's interests are naturally with Framingham, it being his nearest population center. Now he is put into a Sherborn route, and people whose interests are in Sherborn—or Natick as a population center—are put in the Framingham route. Had the department deliberately planned to perfect a system entirely out of consonance with the people's interests it could not have done it more effectively than in the existing arrangement.

Is this service which we, a live town, less than 25 miles from Boston, are entitled to?

I inclose schedule, in tabulated form, showing time of past and present mail delivery by carrier. I also inclose sketch showing how the town is cut in two. At Dowses Corner the two routes almost interlock.

I am not criticizing efforts at economy, although I think the Post Office Department is the last branch of our Government where penuriousness should be practiced. "There is that scattereth and maketh rich and there is that withholdeth more than is meet that tendeth to poverty," particularly in the Postal Service.

I believe an arrangement could have been made, had our people been consulted, whereby Mr. Goulding, leaving the local office immediately after their arrival of the last morning mail, could have covered all of Sherborn, except the distinctive village at North Sherborn, could have given quicker service than we are now getting and enable us to preserve our civic entirety to which our history as a township, incorporated 240 years ago, entitles us.

Mr. Blakslee in a recent address said: "I concede that there may be some errors; there may be some inaccuracies; there may be some instances where better arrangements could have been made, and here and now I emphatically state that given time all such inaccuracies will be corrected and that nowhere, when substantial representation shall be made showing conclusively that the department has been in error will there be one day's delay in a correction thereof." We await the correction pointing to his statement in regard to the few obliged to change post-office address as a specific error.

In conclusion, speaking as a citizen, as chairman of the board of selectmen, as representative to the legislature from this district, and voicing the unanimous sentiments of our people, I pronounce the present arrangement unsatisfactory, impairing the efficiency of our carrier service fully 50 per cent. We hope you may be able to convince the department that our citizens are not querelous fault finders, but have a substantial grievance and one that should be remedied without "one day's delay." It may be the department inherited, as Mr. Blakslee says, "a system that would have wrecked any ordinary commercial enterprise." It is certainly true any business house impairing its service as the department has impaired it in Sherborn would be in financial trouble in 60 days. We ask for no "special privilege," but do desire, exemplified right here in our town, what the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General says it is his object to accomplish, "efficiency in the operation of the Postal Service."

Yours, very truly,

AARON C. DOWSE.

SHERBORN, MASS., January 5, 1916.

Mr. GEORGE P. CARTER,
Secretary Board of Selectmen, Framingham, Mass.

DEAR SIR: In the Framington News a short time ago there appeared a letter from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General in regard to the change in the rural delivery in our district, in which he says that "the patrons will not be seriously inconvenienced."

I wonder if he realizes that under the present service the use of the rural delivery for parcel-post shipments is absolutely out of the question. There has been so much talk in the newspapers influenced by the Postmaster General as to the tremendous advantage both the farmer and the city dweller will derive by a free use of the parcel post that I think it would be of interest to the Postmaster General to see the conditions under which parcel-post matter would have to be shipped from Pleasant Street now. In the first place, the box is almost a quarter of a mile from the house. In winter weather such as we have been having there is no way of stating the exact time when the carrier can get there; in fact, it is a continuous surprise to me when he gets there at all, as it does not seem possible for one man to cover the route which he has laid out for him in the wintertime. Shipping anything by parcel post means that it is necessary for some one to go down from the farm at about the time the carrier is supposed to be due there and wait in the snow and rain until he comes. This is fine for such things as eggs, vegetables, and fruit, to say nothing of the man who is doing the waiting. At present whenever a package is coming to us we are dependent upon our good neighbors to telephone us when the carrier leaves their house so that we may be at the box in order to receive the package. You can appreciate that this puts the use of the mails as a business proposition for us entirely out of the question.

It may be that this is not a "serious inconvenience," but we on Pleasant Street at least are obliged to differ with the Postmaster General as to that.

I trust that you may have success in your endeavor to have the department at least look into the matter before definitely removing the service which we have had since the route was first established and which seems to me to be of a very definite value to the farm.

Yours, very truly,

C. O. LOUD.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CARTER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CARTER: With reference to your letter of the 20th instant, requesting that an inspector be directed to investigate the complaint of the selectmen of Sherborn against the recent readjustment of the rural service in the vicinity of that office and Framingham, Mass., I beg to state that this matter has been taken up with the postmaster at Sherborn with the object of ascertaining the feasibility of effecting such modificaions in the present arrangement of the routes as will obviate all just cause for further complaint, and in the event it is found impossible to adjust the matter without a field investigation, I shall be glad to comply with your request that an inspector visit Sherborn and make a personal investigation of the situation.

Sincerely, yours,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

MY DEAR MR. CARTER: With reference to your letter of the 17th instant, transmitting a copy of a communication addressed you by Mr. D. J. Richards, of the board of selectmen, Sherborn, Mass., protesting against the mail facilities afforded residents of that section since the readjustment of the rural service in Middlesex County, and requesting that steps be taken to remedy the situation, I beg to state that a representative of the department will visit this section of territory within the near future and make a personal investigation with a view to effecting any further changes that are found to be necessary to promote the best interests of the service.

POSTMASTER GENERAL, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I hereby request that the Post Office Department restore to the Medfield (Mass.) post office its free rural delivery route.

My reason in asking for this is on account of the unsatisfactory service which the residents of that town have been subjected to as the result of the change. If your department does not deem it advisable to restore the route, I will then request that a thorough investigation be made immediately.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIAM H. CARTER.

The following families were served between 7.40 and 9 a. m.: Mrs. Sarah Bruce, Miss Mary Fisher, Herbert L. Mitchell, Mrs. Jane Harding, Edgar Bissell, John Harding, Joel E. Heard, William Perry, Frank E. Day, Chairman of Selectmen Richard M. Smalley, Ernest Olyott, Archie L. Crawford, George W. Caldicott, Frank Carr, Agustus Dean, Charles J. Jacobs & Co., Robert Powell, George H. Sauer, George Ehnes, Oliver J. Clark, William F. Weiker, William A. Weiker, and Miss Alice Sewall.

All the above families are now served by the Millis carrier between 2.15 and 3.30 p. m. and the last two patrons would have to have their mail addressed to Millis, but prefer walking to the Medfield post office (1 mile each way) for their mail. One of the patrons said that the letters which were formerly taken from her were delivered in Dedham that same afternoon, while the letters she sends now via Millis are not delivered until the third day. The carrier arrives too late to dispatch his collections the same day, consequently they lay in the Millis office until 9 the next morning and get to Dedham too late to be delivered the next day. This is only one incident.

The following families were served between 7.50 and 8.30 a. m.:

All the above would have to have their post-office address changed to Dover in order to have their mail delivered. The 13 families which are in italics have made the former rural carrier their agent, and he delivers their mail to them every morning. The American Steam Packing Co. is especially hard hit, as their orders come by mail from Boston and are delivered at the factory about 8, while if they were sent to Dover they would not be delivered until about noon (when the automobiling was good). Messrs. Aldrich, Stubbs, and Mason have their mail come to Harding. Mr. Shumway drives to the Medfield post office (2½ miles each way) to get his mail. Messrs. Cheney, Dexter, Sawyer, Shumway, and Hopkins, who were formerly served by two carriers (Dover and Medfield) (see map), are without service. As near as I can find out, the Dover carrier serves only Mr. Mann, Mr. Ware, and the Norfolk Hunt Club. This route is being served by the Dover carrier with an auto, and under the best conditions he covers it between 10 and 12.

The remainder of the route was covered between 9.30 and 12 noon and is now covered by the Walpole carrier with an auto in about the same time, under favorable conditions, only in the opposite direction, so that some of the patrons living within one-half mile of the post office would have to have their mail addressed to Walpole in order to have it delivered. The list of families affected follows:

Edward Lidbury, Joseph Leeds (without service), W. J. Hayward, Daniel Hamant (these would have to change to Walpole), B. H. Smith, A. D. Kingsbury, C. A. Kingsbury, A. H. Clark, J. Kiniry, Miss F. E. Mason, Prof. C. M. Loeffler, Benjamin Kimball, Esq., Mrs. J. De Forest Danielson, Reuben Kingsbury, Joseph Barhose, J. W. Cavanaugh, W. B. Esselin, A. H Smith, G. P. Williams, John Brooks, G. H. Murray, G. R. Hardie, Samuel Craven, Robert Morissey, Davenport Brown, Mrs. William H. McElwain, Mrs. Dr. Charles E. Inches, S. E. Sprague, C. H. Page, Mrs. G. W. Adams, William Miller, A. Mollison, P. A. Katzman, James Carpenter, Frank Bernatowicz, Charles Ruchinski, Patrich Connors, A. B. Tisdale, C. F. Leeds, F. W. Bradberry, G. S. Smith, H. S. Pember, Mrs. E. P. Ord, Mrs. J. S. Percival, and M. R. Blood.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
December 16, 1915.

MY DEAR MR. CARTER: I am in receipt of your letter of the 13th instant inclosing a memorandum giving a list of patrons who have been adversely affected by the discontinuance of route No. 1, Medfield, incident to the revision of the service in Norfolk County, Mass., as ordered effective December 1. I note you request that the route be reestablished from Medfield and adjacent service restored to its former lines, or that an immediate investigation be made of the situation.

In reply I beg to state that a careful examination of the present arrangement shows that all roads formerly covered are now traversed by a rural carrier, excepting the one extending from Cheney to Hopkins Corners, a distance of eight-tenths of a mile, and the retrace on Philip Street involving fifteen one-hundredths of a mile. As to the omission of the road between Cheney and Hopkins Corners, on which four families reside, I would respectfully invite attention to the fact that none of these families is farther than one-quarter of a mile from Cheney or Hopkins Corners, while the farthest of the two families residing on Philip Street from whom direct service has been withdrawn is fifteen one-hundredths of a mile from the point where said street intersects the main line of travel, and may receive service by erecting a box at the junction of these roads.

In view of the foregoing facts it is held that the department would be unwarranted in restoring the former arrangement, since such action would involve an additional expenditure of $960 per annum for no other purpose than to advance from two to four hours the delivery of mail to those families formerly served by carrier from Medfield who are now served from Dover, Millis, and Walpole. However, if it can be shown that the section of territory taken over by the extension of one of the routes from any of the three offices mentioned is more important from a business point of view than other sections of territory in which service is provided earlier in the day, I will be glad to reverse the line of travel on such route or routes involved as will subserve the best interests of the service and that of its patrons.

Sincerely, yours,

JAMES I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

JANUARY 4, 1916.

Hon. JAMES I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General,
Post Office Department.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter relative to the discontinuance of rural route No. 1, Medfield, Mass., incident to the revision of the service in Norfolk County, Mass., ordered effective December 1. In analyzing your statement regarding the road between the Cheney and Hopkins Corners:

1. There are five families residing on that street, viz, George S. Cheney, Charles W. Sawyer, Herbert A. Dexter, Albert C. Shumway, and James C. Hopkins. 2. Messrs. Shumway and Dexter reside nearly one-half mile from the route now traversed by a carrier (Dover). Mr. Cheney's residence is just about one-fourth of a mile from the corner, which the department has named in his honor. Now, Mr. Cheney is a cattle dealer with a wide acquaintance, and is also the town's animal inspector. Every Wednesday he goes to Brighton. He generally has a large mail Tuesdays from people who have calves and cattle which they wish him to take to Brighton. It would be impossible for him to notify everybody with whom he does business that his address would be Dover. Consequently he has to hire his mail deliveries, as at present, or drive to the Medfield post office, a distance of 1¾ miles each way.

Mr. Charles W. Sawyer is a contractor and does a large volume of business through the mails, and Herbert A. Dexter, who lives opposite Mr. Sawyer, is a "drummer" for the Bristol Manufacturing Co., of Bristol, Vt., and has an important mail.

Mr. Shumway is clerk of the Medfield board of assessors, and would have to go nearly one-half mile to get his mail from the hand of a Dover carrier.

Mr. James Hopkins is a Boston business man, and under the former arrangement got his mail before he left for Boston on the train which leaves Farm Street at 8.04 a. m. If he should have it delivered by carrier under the present arrangement his mail would be delivered anywhere from 10 a. m. to 2 p. m. Now all the above families hire the former carrier to deliver their mail to them from the Medfield post office.

Eight years ago when the route was started from the Dover post office a slice of 4 miles was taken from the route, which included a part of North Street, 11 families residing on this street between Richter's corner—or, as the department calls it, Cheney's corner—and the Norfolk Hunt Club immediately moved their boxes down to the corner, a distance varying from a few feet to 3.4 of a mile and have always had their mail come to the Medfield post office. To-day these families, with the single exception of the Norfolk Hunt Club, hire the former carrier to deliver their mail.

Mr. George L. L. Allen, who resides on North Street, about a mile from the Medfield post office, in order to have carrier delivery must have his mail addressed to Dover. Mr. Allen is the town's tree warden and moth superintendent, and mail matter addressed to him at Medfield and forwarded to Dover would involve a delay of 24 hours.

Dr. Henry Lee Morse, Medfield's largest taxpayer—$1,530.16 in 1915—has a large volume of mail, the largest in Medfield. A large part of his mail is from abroad. It would be next to impossible for him to notify his correspondents of a change in address, and a delay of 24 hours would ensue if his mail should be forwarded to Dover. Consequently he pays the former carrier $1.02 per week to take his mail to him each morning.

Nothing could tend to hurt the sale of real estate and house lots in the northern part of the town more than a post-office address different from that of the town in which the property is located. A reversing of the lines of travel on the routes as now in operation would not subserve the best interest of the service or that of its patrons, as the accompanying petitions from the citizens of Medfield, which have been handed to me to forward to you, will testify.

In view of these facts I hereby request that the department either restore its original rural route or else have a field investigation made immediately.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIAM H. CARTER.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, January 6, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CARTER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CARTER: In answer to your letter of the 4th instant, in further reference to the rural service in the vicinity of Medfield, Mass., in which you ask that the route formerly operated from that office be reestablished, and if this is considered impracticable that a field investigation be made immediately, I beg to state that an effort is being made to readjust the rural service so as to obviate the necessity of the patrons at Medfield having to change their address to Dover, which seems to be the most serious objection to the present arrangement of the service, and if the plan that the department has in mind is found to be practicable it will also be possible to restore direct delivery to Messrs. George S. Cheney, Charles W. Sawyer, Herbert A. Dexter, Albert C. Shumway, and James C. Hopkins. Pending a determination of the matter now under consideration, it is deemed inadvisable to authorize a field investigation. I shall be glad to advise you further as soon as a decision is reached in the premises.

Sincerely, yours,

JAMES I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Hon. JAMES I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General,
Post Office Department.

DEAR SIR: In your letter of January 6 you declare that pending a determination of the matter now under consideration regarding the rural service at Medfield, Mass., that your department did not deem it advisable to authorize a field investigation.

In view of the fact that an inspector has been ordered to Sherborn to investigate conditions of that town, will you kindly advise me if it would not be advisable to have the same inspector make a thorough investigation of conditions in the Medfield post office?

Very truly, yours.

WILLIAM H. CARTER.

EAST WALPOLE, MASS., February 9, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CARTER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We understand that you are very much interested in the postal proposition, for your concern probably is suffering just as badly as ours, due to inadequate service. No doubt it is in a measure due to poor railroad service. On the other hand, it is due to the Government's handling of it.

Our mail, that we formerly received at 7.30 a. m., is now so scattered that it comes in in three sections—7.30, 8, and about 8.30 to 8.40 a. m. Where 90 per cent of the morning's mail was received at 7.30 a. m., less than 20 per cent is received at that time now, and the two heavier mails, about equally divided, come in at the later hours mentioned.

You can imagine what this means. Instead of having our mail distributed, so that each department will have it to work upon by 8 o'clock, it is nearer 9.20, and sometimes has been as late at 10 o'clock, getting around to the different departments. It has disarranged our whole morning's system.

It takes a letter mailed by the Phillipsdale Paper Mill Co., a subsidiary of ours at Phillipsdale, R. I., say, from to-night until noontime to-morrow before it reaches us, although there is the Wrentham branch of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, a direct line from Providence to Boston, stopping at East Walpole, making three stops every morning, 6.50, 7.50, and 10; but instead of coming in on any one of these trains, it either comes out from Boston on the train that arrives here at 12.40 p. m. or from Providence at 1.17.

Pardon the length of this letter. We will gladly collect any information you may need in your work on this matter.

Thanking you in advance, we are, yours, very truly,

BIRD & SON,
H. H. MILLER, Office Manager.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last two words, and he is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am neither opposed to automobiles nor to economy, but am most heartily in favor of both. I believe that the automobile has come to take the place of the horse in all local travel and short-distance transportation. I believe that with automobiles the mails can be delivered not only earlier to the patrons but with greater dispatch; and the time is near at hand, if not already here, when such mails can be so delivered at less cost and more economically and to a greater number of patrons than with a horse-drawn vehicle. But the 50-mile motor routes are too long and are impractical for regular, reliable, and prompt delivery of mails, except upon a comparatively few and especially improved roads, permitting of rapid travel the whole of the year.

Taking the generally and prevailing conditions of the roads of the country, a part of the year the 50-mile service is irregular, unreliable, and delayed all the time, and all the year this service is irregular, unreliable, and delayed a part of the time.

And even with such especially improved road conditions prevailing, if the number of patrons be great or the quantity of mail to be handled be large, the same can not be sorted and classified for delivery over 50-mile routes without delay in starting and oversights and mistakes in the delivery to the patrons.

The auxiliary service providing for a helper to meet the emergencies of bad weather and adverse road conditions is impractical and can not be operated without great loss and waste in the service. If the route is divided so that each of the two carriers begin prompt delivery from the office, each carrier must travel the whole 50 miles to deliver the mail over one-half of the route. The two carriers would meet at the halfway point on the route, which, as generally laid out, is the farthest point from the office, and they must retrace the whole distance traveled to return to the starting point, requiring double time and a duplication of men, wagons, and horses; or, in other words, in order to serve 50 miles in bad weather or adverse road conditions, 100 miles must be traveled.

For these reasons the 50-mile routes are impossible of economical operation and are impractical for regular, reliable, and prompt service, except where roads are maintained in a high state of improvement and the service can be operated by one carrier the whole of the year.

I realize that the Government is serving only a part of the people of the country with free mail delivery, and that all the people of the country are by right equally entitled to this service, and I am in favor of extending it to all the rural patrons.

I am in favor of economy, but I am opposed to the 50-mile route motor service as a means to effect economy. Reducing the cost at the expense of regular, reliable, and prompt service is not economy. It is a false system of cost reduction. Economy is maintaining efficient service while reducing expense and cost of operation, or maintaining greater efficiency in the service at the same cost. If mere cost reduction is economy, then greater economy would be effected by triweekly service, and still greater economy by a discontinuance of the service altogether.

The shorter routes not only afford the patrons earlier service and more regular, reliable, and prompt deliveries, but I have made inquiries among men seeking carrier positions, and I find a majority would prefer a 25-mile route over a 50-mile route, even at one-half the salary.

Reducing the number of carriers and increasing the salaries of those remaining, where a superior service can be secured by maintaining the full number of employees at the same cost to the Government is not only a false economy but is a wrong policy of public employment.

I opposed this 50-mile service coming into Wayne County, which forms a part of my district. I made a special trip to Washington last fall to enter my objections in person against it. It was established in this county, with certain modifications, over my protest.

With the experience that my constituents have had with this service, and the actual workings of the system as reported to me by the rural patrons in Wayne County, I am resolved that if this service is established in another county in my district it will be over more than my protest.

The patrons of the rural routes in Wayne County, after trial and experience, are opposed to the 50-mile rural route service. A part of the carriers appointed have resigned, and others are threatening their resignation, and applicants on the eligible list are declining to accept appointment. General dissatisfaction with the service is being expressed from both town and country. Its friends can not be located. In the language of Shakespeare, "None so poor to do it reverence."

The 50-mile route service took effect January 4, and complaints and petitions began at once to come in from the patrons and have since continued without abatement. I renewed my objections and demanded both in person and in writing immediate restoration of efficient service, and the department sent the following communication to the postmaster at Richmond January 14, 10 days after the service was inaugurated:

JANUARY 14, 1916.

Mr. CHARLES B. BECK,
Postmaster, Richmond, Ind.

MY DEAR MR. BECK: Representative FINLY H. GRAY has written this office complaining of the operation of the motor-vehicle rural routes in Wayne County and stating that the service is irregular and subject to long delays; that many patrons do not receive their mail until very late in the day, and that the mails reach other patrons two or three days late. He has also presented letters from patrons to sustain his complaints against the service, and is insisting that it be restored promptly to its former status. As Representative GRAY originally objected strongly to the introduction of the motor-vehicle service in Wayne County, and afterwards came to Washington and entered his protest against its establishment, it is deemed essential to have a statement from you relative to the operation of the service before taking any action upon his complaints. Please submit such a statement promptly, making it so complete that the department may have a full understanding of all conditions.

Sincerely, yours, JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

In the meantime two inspectors and rural-route specialists were detailed to Wayne County, where they have remained on the grounds, readjusting the routes, directing and supervising the service, and reassuring the postmaster of the final vindication of the new system and the ultimate reconciliation of the patrons to the change. The auxiliary service was also invoked and two carriers were placed upon each of the routes out of Richmond, since which time the double service has been constantly maintained, barring interruptions by resignations and the appointment of temporary carriers.

It is claimed that a favorable report has been received from Richmond, purporting to bear the signature of the postmaster. I do not know what the inspectors have reported over the signature of the postmaster, but I do know that patrons are everywhere complaining; that many patrons are refusing to receive the mail from the carriers and are renting boxes at the post office; that carriers are resigning their positions and applicants are declining to accept appointment; that the postmaster is in a state of nervous exhaustion and collapse, induced by overwork, want of sleep, and the constant clamor of the patrons for tolerable service.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this service fundamentally and on principle. It contemplates the abolishment and discontinuance of the smaller post offices of the country and a concentration of the mail and business facilities in the larger towns and cities. I am especially opposed to the 50-mile route service, because of the severance of direct mail communication with local community centers and among those having every-day business and social relations.

Wayne County, as well as other counties in my district, includes many highly developed and well-organized country communities. The town and the surrounding country form such communities, of which the town is the business and social center and the general meeting and assembling place of the people. In most, if not all, of these towns well-regulated stores, a bank or banks, and other business institutions have been established. Modern high-school building, churches, theaters, or lecture halls have been erected, and physicians and other professional men have located there in response to the needs and wants of the people. The post office has likewise been established and the rural-route service has become a part of the community organization. Here the farmers come to market and ship their products, do their banking, and to purchase supplies to meet their daily needs. Here all the children of the near-by country come to attend school, and from greater distances come the more advanced students to graduate in the higher branches of education. Here the people come to attend their clubs, churches, lodge sessions, lecture courses, and various gatherings and entertainments.

Farmers or members of their families driving into town in the afternoon or evening on business or to attend club meetings or social entertainments and school children and high-school students from the country call at the post office to receive the afternoon or late mail. And farmers often drive in from the country to receive important mail matter arriving too late for delivery by the carrier, and which it is necessary for them to have in time for some important business transaction.

But the 50-mile route service deprives the people of all these advantages and conveniences, and places their mail beyond their reach in a far-distant town to which they never go and in which none of their interests are located, neither business nor social.

In these agricultural community centers telephone exchanges have been established, and telephone service has been extended over the country coextensive with the territory covered by the rural routes running out from their respective towns. Country patrons order many articles of merchandise to be delivered to them by parcel post, and town residents likewise take advantage to receive their food products from the country by the carriers on their return trips. Physicians respond to phone calls from their patients and send out their medicine by the rural carriers. The telephone and the carrier service have become joined as one coordinate system of local communication and transportation in general and universal use.

The 50-mile route service breaks up and destroys all this, and separates the people of the community in all their social and business affairs. If the people submit to this system they must change physicians and all their established business and social relations, and must pay telephone charges to the county seat, while the service is free at their own town.

The following paragraph of a letter from Gaar G. and T. C. Elliason, rural-route patrons formerly receiving their mail from the Centerville post office, in Wayne County, but transferred under the new service to a route from the city of Richmond, fairly presents the attitude of the rural patrons of Wayne County toward the 50-mile service:

I live only a short distance from Centerville; it is our community center; we get our groceries there, sell our produce there; those of us who have children old enough send them to high school there; and we do our banking there; why not get our mail from there? I am a stockholder of the Centerville State Bank, of Centerville, Ind., and when the dividends were declared January 1 each stockholder was mailed a check for his share of these. It is about 15 or 20 days ago and I have not received my check yet, owing to the poor mail service, and it was a real snug sum, too. The letter has passed the post office in Centerville, so I have informed Postmaster Beck of its failure to arrive over Richmond route A.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 4, page 2, the word "fifteen" and insert the word "thirteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, line 4, by striking out the word "fifteen" and inserting the word "thirteen."

Mr. MOON. I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] makes a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BENNET. I think that is clearly in order under the Holman rule. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will please state the point of order.

Mr. MOON. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. BENNET. I move to strike out, in line 4, page 2, the word "fifteen" and insert the word "thirteen."

Mr. MOON. I do not reckon that would be subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend at the close of my five minutes to insist very strenuously upon the adoption of my particular amendment, but I do want to call the attention of the committee to the necessity of having good post-office inspectors, because of one provision in the bill which occurs later on, in relation to surety bonds, where the entire evidence is largely the surmise of two post-office inspectors.

In the city which I have the honor, in part, to represent there are a good many surety companies, and when the matter was brought to my attention in the Committee on Rules, after that hearing I took occasion to make some investigation as to the charge that there is a combine of the surety companies. I can not find in the hearings or anywhere else any evidence of any such combine, and the surety companies all deny the existence of such a combine. There was a man by the name of Towner who went before the committee and in a broad and embracing way said he represented all of the surety companies. I find that he represented fewer than 20, while there are more than 40, and that so far as rates are concerned it seemed to be understood before our committee that the carriers had a flat rate of 50 cents a thousand on their bonds. In the particular postal district in which I live the rate is 25 cents a thousand, and the bonds are written by a surety company that is not mentioned in the hearings at all.

The only evidence there was of any ill practice on the part of any surety company was confined to one agent or attorney of one company, in connection with one case, and upon that evidence very largely, and upon the request of the Assistant Postmaster General, is based the proposition that we shall turn over the surety-company business to the Government so far as it is connected with the screen-wagon contracts and the carriers and the clerks; in other words, that we shall take another long step toward the party represented by my friend from the southern part of Manhattan [Mr. LONDON], who is the sole representative on this floor of the Socialist Party, and that we shall take another long step toward Government ownership.

This screen-wagon service is not properly understood. It is an important and, from a surety standpoint, a dangerous business. There sat in this Congress last year Representative Metz, from Brooklyn, who became an indemnitor on the screen-wagon contract in the city of New York, on the contract immediately preceding the present one. When the contractor failed to deliver the mail as he was called upon to do, Mr. Metz was called upon by the surety company to make good, because under the law the surety company signs the bond with the contractor. When the security company were called on to make good they called on Mr. Metz, who had indemnified them, and it cost him over $100,000. Now, what this committee proposes is that, with no evidence except the suspicion of two post-office inspectors—with no evidence that a lawyer would recognize—we are to overturn the existing system and put into the hands of the Government this business now being carried on by 75,000 agents—a trifling portion of their business, to be sure—the hearings before our committee showed less than 1 per cent—but nevertheless a proposition that is indefensible in principle.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET. May I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. I take this opportunity early in the consideration of the bill to say in addition that I have been asked by the representatives of some 15 or 20 of these companies, in Baltimore, New York, and Philadelphia, to say in their behalf that they absolutely deny that there is any conspiracy or collusion between them or among them in connection with this business, and to say for them to this House and to the Post Office Department that if they have been violating any law of the United States—and that would be a violation—if they have been combining together to raise the price that the United States Government has to pay for this service, their books are open to the Post Office Department or to a committee of this House at any time; and until that is done they think they have the old-fashioned right to be considered innocent until, at least, they are accused by some responsible person of doing something wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BENNET. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The district that I represent has likewise been inflicted with inspectors from the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Lancaster County, of which Lincoln, Nebr., is the county seat, had as nearly perfect a rural service a year ago as had any county in the entire land.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. MOON. I do not want to make any suggestion to the gentleman as to how he shall conduct this debate, but it seems to me it would be a little more orderly, and more effective also, if this discussion were to come on that part of the bill where we deal with the rural routes. However, as I say, I do not wish to dictate to the gentleman at all as to how or when he shall make his speech.

Mr. REAVIS. My principal object in speaking at this time is to protest against the conduct of the inspectors in the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and we are now considering the section relating to inspectors. I have always held to the belief that the function of the Post Office Department is to give to the Nation the most direct and beneficial service of any department of the Government. Mr. Blakslee, who is Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, seems to have no regard for that ideal of the service in his department, but is obsessed with the idea that the sole function of that department is economy, without regard to its effect on the efficiency of the service.

These inspectors have been out in my district. No one knew they were coming. No one knew they had been there until the order came from the Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General revising and reorganizing the service in Lancaster County. They cut down the routes more than one-third; and I charge here and now, Mr. Chairman, that those routes were laid out by inspectors from blue prints in a room in the Lincoln Hotel in Lincoln, Nebr., and without personal inspection of the routes by the men who claim to have reorganized that system. There is one route under this so-called reorganization that goes over an embankment 40 feet high, as perpendicular as the walls of this room. [Laughter.] It goes across a swamp a quarter of a mile long that nobody has ever been able to traverse and nobody ever will be able to traverse. Two miles of it are across fields and farms where no road has ever been and where no road ever will be. I came to Washington in the heat of last August with the idea of finding out if something could not be done for the relief of the people in that county. I met with no encouragement whatever. I was constantly met with the proposition that the purpose of that department was economy.

There is no legislation with reference to the rural service by Congress except to fix the salary of the carrier.

The entire service is open to the discretion of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. And, Mr. Chairman, when this beneficial service of the Post Office Department is going to be prostituted by Mr. Blakslee to the low plane of financial consideration, I am in hopes that this committee will some time during this session return a bill that will take from him the discretion that he is utilizing to the destruction of efficient service.

I am in favor of a standard route being fixed. If I were to offer an amendment in good faith to this section, I would move to strike out "fifteen" altogether. There has been too much of this so-called inspection across the country, and I say to the gentlemen on the other side that the greatest menace to your political welfare next fall lies in the treatment that your Fourth Assistant Postmaster General has been giving the rural community of this Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. I would like two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REAVIS. This is a Republic, Mr. Chairman, where the people control their own Government, where the people are in fact the Government itself. If this be an intelligent Government, the voter must be informed with reference to the issues that are national in their character and which are confronting them. I say to you that the dissemination of information by reason of the daily press, the magazines, and other periodicals that go into the farmer's home in this Nation is worth all it costs if we never got a dollar in return. [Applause.]

Next fall we will have a national election that will turn in some measure upon the war now raging in Europe. Stop every daily paper you have to-day, stop the circulation of every periodical that you have to-day, and what will be the equipment of the American voter next fall in a national election which involves our foreign relations? He will be utterly impotent to meet the proposition that is put up to him. Yet when you go to the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General and tell him of the value that Rural Mail Service is to the Government, how intimately and directly that service touches the people of America, the only reply you get from him is, "I am not interested in the inconveniences of John Jones or John Smith out in Nebraska; I am trying to effect economy." The best way to effect economy, if that is the purpose of the department, is to do away with the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General and save his salary. [Laughter and applause.]

Let me tell you of one instance of inconvenience that obtained in my district. A former United States Senator owned a half section just outside of Lincoln. The rural route ran on the west side of that half section, and he built his improvements there. In three or four months the order came from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General to change the route over onto the east side of the section. He put his buildings, his house and his barn, on wheels, and took them over to the east side of the section that he might be near a rural delivery. In 60 days the order came from the Fourth Assistant to put the service back where it was before. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Had the man taken the house off the wheels before they changed the route again?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; and he had, unfortunately, built two concrete silos that he could not move, and he was forced to stay there.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman referred to a 40-foot perpendicular drop in one of these rural routes. Is that the reason the department is now asking for an aeroplane service? [Laughter.]

Mr. REAVIS. No; for the reason that when it ascertained the impossibility of dropping over the embankment, they changed the route so that it went around the embankment and away from the swamp.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins I want to say that while I regret that this discussion has taken place at this time, still if gentlemen want to go on I shall not object, but I would be glad to agree upon some time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am rising to discuss a matter which pertains to the section under consideration. I wish to direct the chairman's attention to certain language in lines 6, 7, 8, and 9 which I think is surplusage.

Mr. MOON. It is, and it will be stricken out.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was carried in last year's bill, and now it is in this year's bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out of the bill, in page 2, lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, the following language:

an increase of two submitted in lieu of two assistant superintendents, Railway Mail Service, at $2,350 each; to be transferred from the office of the Second Assistant.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 2 by striking out, after the word "each," in line 6, the following: "an increase of two submitted in lieu of two assistant superintendents, Railway Mail Service, at $2,350 each; to be transferred from the office of the Second Assistant."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of rewards for the detection, arrest, and conviction of post-office burglars, robbers, and highway mail robbers: Provided, That rewards may be paid, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, when an offender or suspect of the class mentioned was killed in the act of committing the crime or in resisting arrest: And provided further, That of the amount herein appropriated not to exceed $5,000 may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, for the purpose of securing information concerning violations of the postal laws and for services and information looking toward the apprehension of criminals, $25,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on both provisos for the purpose of having the chairman explain.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, under the present law the rewards can be paid only for the detection, arrest, and conviction of post-office burglars, robbers, and highway mail robbers. There is no law that provides for a reward where the offender was killed in the commission of the crime. A number of instances have occurred where men have attempted to break into post offices and were killed, and the rewards could not be paid under the technical construction of the law. This is intended to remedy that situation.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota withdraws the point of order.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 25, strike out the proviso beginning after the word "robbers" down to and including the word "arrest," in line 3, page 4, being the language:

"Provided, That rewards may be paid, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, when an offender or suspect of the class mentioned was killed in the act of committing the crime or in resisting arrest."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I do not know but that possibly this is justified, but this is my ninth year in a legislative body, and I have never yet knowingly voted to pay anyone any reward for killing someone else. This particular class of offenders, except the highway mail robbers, are not the most menacing kind, and I doubt anyway whether this House ought to go on record as saying to a man, "If you run across a post-office burglar, shoot him, and the Government of the United States will pay you money." Of course, we have to protect the mails, and there ought to be enough pride in their office and regard for their oath in our postal employees, and I think there is, to make them resist burglars and highway robbers without giving them as an incentive a statute that if they go out and kill some one of these people they will be paid for it. I do not recall any other statute, though of course there may be statutes, which contains any similar proviso. I think we ought to very seriously consider whether it is well to go on record in these days when we are trying to boast our country as humane as compared with some other countries, as being in favor of a proposition that we offer to employees of the Government, for that is what it amounts to largely, a reward for killing people, even though those people happen to be thieves or highway robbers.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. COX. In the main, the gentleman is probably right, but what would the gentleman do in a case like this? We will say that notorious yeggmen are actually breaking into a post office and the employee is on the inside. A fusillade of shots is fired backward and forward. It is utterly impossible for the postal employee to arrest the yegg, and in the firing of shots to save his own life he kills the yeggman. Does not the gentleman feel that under circumstances of that kind he ought to be paid for it?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I will say frankly that if I were that employee I would go to the poorhouse before I would go to the Government of the United States to be paid, because in the performance of my duty I killed a man. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. I do not agree with the gentleman at all.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman asked my opinion and he has it.

Mr. COX. There is a case just like that down in Florida.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is it not true that after Madero was assassinated it was claimed that the killing was justified because he was resisting arrest, resisting an officer, trying to escape?

Mr. BENNET. I think that that was the claim, but I do not think that public opinion would have upheld the officer who shot him if in addition to shooting him he had gone around, even to the Mexican Government, and requested a reward.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman does not understand the purport of my question. It offers a temptation to some people sometimes to kill a man for an insufficient reason and claim that he was resisting an officer.

Mr. BENNET. I think so. It seems to me that it is putting into the minds of human beings the temptation to kill people.

The knowledge that there is a statute of the United States which says that if you shoot a yeggman outside of the window and kill him, you can go around to the Treasury Department and get $250 or $500 or something for killing him, would offer a temptation to some people to unjustly kill. A man in that position ought to do his duty because it is his duty to do it, and it is his duty to defend the United States mail as so many brave men in the years that have gone by have done, without the incentive of a reward.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DIXON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 3873. An act to authorize the counties of Minidoka and Cassia, State of Idaho, to construct a bridge across Snake River.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to my friend that I fear he does not fully comprehend this proposition. Under the law now we have a right to pay rewards for the arrest and conviction of these robbers. It is proposed to amend this statute by simply allowing the Government to pay a reward when the robber is killed in the act of committing the crime or in resisting arrest. The gentleman seems to think that this is a commission to go outside and kill yeggmen and others. It is not. But here is a crime being committed, and the Government official is attempting to resist the commission of that crime and the robber is killed, or the crime has been committed and the robber resists arrest and is killed.

Now, it seems to me there is as much justice in one proposition as the other. The gentleman forgets that under the law of the land, the common law of the country, that he or I, whether officers or not, have the right to kill any man we catch in the commission of a felony. Under the statutes, when a man has committed a felony and has resisted arrest and is killed it is considered justifiable homicide.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. Is not there a distinction between the right to kill and a reward for the killing?

Mr. MOON. If the Government wants to protect itself, it seems to me it would be just as wise to say that a man would be entitled to a reward who would kill a man in the act of robbing and plundering the Government as to say you should afterwards capture or arrest and convict and then pay the reward. I do not see any difference in it.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, if I can reply briefly to the gentleman from Tennessee, I will say I understood the proposition thoroughly. The language is clear; but my point is that we ought not to tempt Government employees to kill people by the knowledge of a statute under which they get pay. I know of two instances, I will say to the gentleman, who has read me a little lecture on law with which I am perfectly familiar, in the town in which I was born, where the police officers did exactly what the gentleman stated they had the right to do, and in neither instance were they arrested, because the law was very clear; but the reason they did the killing was because they were sworn officers of the law, as these post-office men are, and when the men attempted to escape in the two instances these officers did their duty. These men had committed felonies, and when they refused to stop the police officers shot them dead, but they never thought of turning around and going down to the county board of supervisors and asking a reward for shooting men, an act which they performed in the regular routine of their duty. They had the right to do it, but they ought not to be paid for it.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I do.

Mr. MOON. Does not the gentleman know that this Congress has passed bills that rewarded marshals for killing offenders for violation of the law?

Mr. BENNET. I will say to the gentleman I do not know it.

Mr. MOON. Well, there was the case of Larkins——

Mr. BENNET. I will have to admit that there were four years recently passed during which I was not a Member of this House, and certain other legislation has been passed in that time with which I do not entirely sympathize. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps the difficulty in this case arises entirely from the fact that this is a proviso, and that separates it from the language which precedes it. I think many of us have as high humanitarian ideas regarding our duty as the gentleman from New York; but when you come to examine the conditions stated here in the terms of the bill it will be seen, I think, to be entirely justifiable. The sentence immediately preceding the proviso is:

For payment of reward for the detection, arrest, and conviction of post-office burglars, robbers, and highway mail robbers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in cases of that kind the discretion is left to the Postmaster General to reward those who have assisted in the detection, arrest, and conviction of post-office burglars, and so forth; but in cases where in an attempt to arrest desperate criminals it has been necessary, because of an armed conflict between the officers of the law and the desperadoes, to shoot and kill one of them, presumably in self-defense, then, under the terms of this bill, unless the proviso is given, there would be no opportunity of paying a reward to these men for their desperate service on behalf of the Government, because you could not pay it for the arrest or for the detection or the conviction of a man who is dead, and therefore this proviso only goes to the extent of saying if in the case you can not arrest, you can not detect, you can not convict a man when he is shot, it shall not prevent the Postmaster General from paying these men a reward for the services which they have rendered.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I do.

Mr. NORTON. Would not the term "detection" cover the case where the man was shot during an attempt to arrest him?

Mr. TOWNER. Well, I am not sure about that, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. NORTON. I would say that the term "detection" would cover that.

Mr. TOWNER. I think no difficulty comes up in the form of the proviso and that in substance the objection ought not to lie, because it is only an exception that ought to be made in cases of that kind.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is unduly alarmed in reference to this matter, for the reason that if a man ruthlessly slays another, although he is guilty of a felony, he would be answerable to the law of the State, and the law of the State would punish him. He may not be guilty of the crime of murder necessarily, but if he did it ruthlessly, not necessarily in self-defense, he is guilty of a crime in every State I know of. Now, if you would say in the event I am out endeavoring to detect a criminal who had committed a crime—burglarized a post office—that I shall lose my reward in the event I shall get into a controversy and am not armed with a sufficient authority to prosecute it to an arrest, you virtually say to the fleeing criminal—who may have committed a homicide or murder while in the act of committing the burglary—you will virtually say to him, "Go and flee or go and make what resistance you please, because the Government does not intend to protect these people who seek to arrest and prevent you from getting away, because the very moment you get out of his hands—get away from him—he has lost his reward, and if he is obliged to kill he has lost the reward." What is the result? We let the criminal escape. Now, I believe that a man who goes to make an arrest ought to exercise every precaution to prevent loss of human life. He ought not to take human life unless it is absolutely necessary for him to do it, but in this particular instance here the Postmaster General would be called upon to make an investigation as to the character of the act, and if he has ruthlessly slain the man or killed him without knowing exactly what he was doing, he does it at his peril, and I take it that the Postmaster General would not reward such a man, because men who go out and arrest desperate criminals must take some desperate chances. So far as I am concerned, I want this provision to remain. I believe that happens to be the law in most of the States of the Union in reference to the apprehension of criminals.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a great many people throughout the country imagine that if we have a national law with a penalty attached it will receive a great deal more respect than a State law, and that while a criminal may with impunity violate a State law, when he violates a national law he is only inviting himself inside the walls of a penitentiary. And yet in the last fiscal year the Post Office Department acted upon 1,284 claims of postmasters for reimbursement of losses caused by burglaries in post offices. It is true that the 1,284 burglaries did not all occur in the last fiscal year, because there were claims held over; but probably that represents about the number of post-office burglaries per year in the last few years. Of these not one-half were cases where men were arrested for the burglary, and not a very large proportion of those who were arrested were convicted. So it has come to the point that, although we have a national law which many people suppose can not be violated with impunity, it has almost come to the point that the burglary of a post office is a safe transaction, and in many of the cases of attempted burglaries of post offices there is no loss. I remember when I was managing a post office myself in a country town, and had to sleep in the office for protection of the office, there were several attempted burglaries, where nobody was ever caught and no loss was sustained.

I am not saying this in criticism of the post-office inspectors. I think they do as good service as they can. I am not saying it in criticism of anybody or anything, except to call attention to the fact that a national law which reaches down to the people themselves is no more effective in preventing crime than a State law or the law or ordinance of a municipality.

As to the particular proposition now pending, the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], I might say that several times in recent years this House has voted payment of money on reports from the Committee on Claims where some one endeavoring to capture a post-office burglar had killed the burglar. Gentlemen have referred to this as though this were for the payment of money to the post-office employee. It may happen sometimes that it is for the payment of the post-office employee, but in the main these rewards are not paid to Government employees at all; they are paid to the local constables or local police officials, whom we seek to encourage in the effort on their part to prevent these crimes, and which they are not obliged to do, so far as they are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a few years ago there was a case, and a few other cases, which I think were the genesis of this proposition, which I am informed appeared in the Post Office bill last year for the first time. I had the impression it was two years old. We had a case here, which came up from one of the States, where a local police officer attempted to arrest a burglar of a post office and they got into a running fight in the street. The local police officer was shot all to pieces, but managed to shoot the other man and kill him. If he had not killed him and he had been arrested, he would have received a reward; and the question was whether it was any better for the Government to pay some police officer who had arrested a man without a fight and without danger or to say to him, "If you take the danger and make the fight and risk your life, we pay you the same reward." [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Would not precisely the same result that is sought to be obtained by this language be attained if the word "and" at the end of line 23 on page 3 was changed to "or," and would not the man that was mentioned by the gentleman have been in a position where he could have been considered for a reward if the language of the law had been at that time that way?

Mr. MANN. Congress does not pay for the arrest of a man charged with a post-office burglary or for the detection of the man. The man must be convicted. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] asked awhile ago if it would not be detection when you got the man. The man would have to be convicted in order for the reward to be paid.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman think a man should be rewarded for detecting a post-office burglar?

Mr. MANN. He is rewarded for the conviction of a post-office burglar.

Mr. NORTON. Do you not think he should be rewarded just the same as for detecting a post-office burglar?

Mr. MANN. Well, there is no way of ascertaining whether he is a burglar or not, so far as that is concerned, if he lives, unless he is convicted. Everywhere we provide, where rewards are provided—and we provide rewards by the Government in a good many cases—it is for the detection, arrest, and conviction. That is the way it ought to be.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BENNET. In the case, taking the case that the gentleman from Illinois cited, where a man was supposed to be a post-office burglar, and there was this running fight, and the brave officer was shot up pretty well, but killed the man who shot him, there is no way under our statute that it can ever be determined easily if that man that was killed was a burglar or not.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; and that is the reason why this language leaves it in the discretion of the Postmaster General as to that. It is not the discretion of the Postmaster General at all as to the detection, arrest, and conviction. The man that does that can bring a suit in the Court of Claims against the Government. That is no discretionary power vested in the Postmaster General, but in the other case if the Postmaster General finds—and he has to make a finding—that there was a burglary, and that the man who was shot was the burglar, and that the man who claims the reward did shoot him, under the conditions he is entitled to make an award to the man.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BENNET. Why is it any more illogical or any more dangerous to put it into the statute that the man can be paid for the detection of the crime, where if he went into the Court of Claims he would have to prove that he actually detected an actual crime, than to put this language in the bill, where a man can be paid for killing a man as to whom he must prove in the Court of Claims that the man was a post-office burglar?

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman will readily see that you could not pay for the detection and the arrest and the conviction, because a dozen men may detect the burglar, two men may assist in the arrest, and somebody else cause the conviction. We pay only one award.

Mr. BENNET. I know that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I think that the point made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is a good one, and that this proviso ought not to be enacted into law.

I call the attention of the committee to the language, beginning with line 23, on page 3:

> For payment of rewards for the detection, arrest, and conviction of post-office burglars, robbers, and highway mail robbers: Provided, That rewards may be paid, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, when an offender or suspect of the class mentioned was killed in the act of committing the crime or in resisting arrest.

Mark that language—"or suspect"— > or suspect of the class mentioned was killed * * * in resisting arrest.

Now, suppose that a burglary has been committed, and an officer, a week later, suspects that a certain man committed it. He and the "suspect" are on the street, in the night, alone. The suspect says, "What do you mean by seizing hold of me? I have done nothing. I am as innocent as you are." He protests. He resists. Now, under such circumstances, some officers—not all officers, because there are many worthy men on the police force throughout the country—but some officers will think of the reward. Others are quick tempered—and both kinds will shoot. And who has been killed? A suspect, against whom not one particle of evidence has been or can be adduced, and killed without even the semblance of opportunity anywhere to establish his innocence.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In just a moment. Mr. Chairman, during the French Revolution, as all Members of the House will recall, there was passed a world-famous and eternally infamous law called the "law of suspect." Couthon and Robespierre were, I believe, chiefly responsible for it, Robespierre being the prime instigator. But Couthon was active and instrumental in having it become a law. Under it no formal complaint, such as we recognize as a complaint, was necessary. To make an arrest it required only that some person should suspect that another was hostile to the Revolution and have his or her name placed on the list of suspects. As suspects, and only as suspects, men, women, boys, and girls by thousands went to the guillotine. The record shows that as many as 50 or more were sometimes tried together and condemned in less than half an hour and sent to the guillotine for being "suspects."

Here for the first time, I believe, despite what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, we are proposing to enact a law to reward an officer who kills a person whom he suspects of having committed a crime. It is well enough to pay a reward where it leads to the arrest or conviction of an offender, but to pay a reward to a man for killing a mere suspect, who may be entirely innocent of crime, is putting a premium upon murder by hot-headed, irresponsible officers, of whom there are many in the United States. It is not very uncommon to read in the papers of an officer being charged with murder for killing some person whom he claims was resisting arrest. More than one officer has gone to the penitentiary upon conviction for such offense. In such cases there was evidence to establish guilt. But here is a bill offering a reward for the killing of the suspect when the officer and his victim are alone in the night, with no opportunity for the dead person or any of his friends to utter a syllable to establish his innocence. In my judgment that language ought not to be incorporated into the statutes of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, while I think that the suspicion——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to limit this debate to the remarks that the gentleman is going to make. We have already taken up too much time on this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to five minutes. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, while I think that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is unnecessarily alarmed about the effect of this statute, I desire to offer as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] a very brief amendment, which I think will cure any defect that there may be in this respect. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Chairman. After the word "resisting," in the third line, on page 4, insert the word "lawful," so that it will read "killed in the act of committing the crime or in resisting lawful arrest."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 3, after the word "resisting" insert the word "lawful."

Mr. MOON. We have no objection to that amendment, Mr. Chairman. It means "lawful" anyway.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think that what the gentleman has just said is probably correct, but I wish to have it inserted to remove the doubts of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 3, after the word "resisting," insert the word "lawful."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, can I have a word? Can I have two or three minutes on that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can if he secures unanimous consent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, for three minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Make it three.

Mr. MOON. Very well, three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] may have three minutes more?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee. Just where is that amendment offered?

Mr. MADDEN. After the word "resisting."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Resisting lawful arrest?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, inserting the word "lawful" does not at all meet my objection. Who is to determine whether it is a lawful arrest, when a suspect is killed by an officer in the night, and he is a stranger in that community? The man is dead—dead without a known friend or acquaintance. He was a "suspect" merely because he was a tramp. The officer is the only witness. He says, "The man resisted me and I killed him. I want the reward."

The gentleman's amendment does not meet the criticism at all. At this point, I am reminded by my friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], that in some, perhaps all, of the States police officers are forbidden to accept rewards of the kind here proposed. It is everywhere the duty of such officers to arrest offenders against the law, yet this bill proposes that we pay a reward not only for arresting an offender but also for killing a mere "suspect"; a stranger, perhaps a poor, homeless, houseless, wandering workman looking for employment, and as innocent as is the gentleman from Iowa. But he is dead, and the officer says that it was a lawful arrest.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Because the man was suspected.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes. He was suspected, that is all, and killed by an officer anxious to earn a reward. No such law ought to be enacted in this Republic. We want no French Revolution law of the suspect in the twentieth century in the United States of America. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the gentleman a question? Would it not relieve the objection of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the words "or suspect"?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; and I was about to offer that amendment. If the gentleman from Connecticut will offer it, I will not do so.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GORDON. May the amendment be reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "or suspect," being the last word on line 1 and the first word on line 2 of page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: Page 4, line 1, strike out the word "or" at the end of line 1, and the word "suspect" at the beginning of line 2, on page 4.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin) there were—ayes 41, noes 37.

Mr. COX. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused, not a sufficient number seconding the demand.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as it is half an hour since the amendment was offered, I ask unanimous consent that it may be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from New York will be reported again.

The amendment was again read, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BENNET: Page 3, line 25, after the word "robbers" strike out the following proviso:

"Provided, That rewards may be paid, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, when an offender or suspect of the class mentioned was killed in the act of committing the crime or in resisting lawful arrest."

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out in line 3, page 4, the words "or in resisting lawful arrest"; and I will ask unanimous consent to address the committee two minutes on this subject.

Mr. MANN. This is an amendment to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 3, strike out the words "or in resisting lawful arrest."

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to address the committee for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska) there were—ayes 7, noes 44.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BENNET. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were 19 ayes and 42 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter the Postmaster General shall have authority to employ acting employees in place of all employees or substitutes hereinafter mentioned who are injured while on duty, who shall be granted leave of absence with full pay during the period of disability, but not exceeding one year, then at the rate of 50 per cent of the employee's salary for the period of disability exceeding 1 year, but not exceeding 12 months additional, and the Postmaster General is authorized to pay the sum of $2,000, which shall be exempt from payment of debts of the deceased, to the legal representatives, for the benefit of wife, children, or dependent relatives, of any railway postal clerk, substitute railway postal clerk, supervisory official of the Railway Mail Service, post-office inspector, letter carrier in the City Delivery Service, rural letter carrier, post-office clerk, special-delivery messenger, or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service who shall be killed while on duty, or who, being injured while on duty, shall die within one year thereafter as the result of such injury: Provided, That no compensation shall be paid any such employee for any injury occasioned by his own negligence. To enable the Postmaster General to carry out the provisions of the above, $234,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph, and especially to the language in line 24, "or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service who shall be killed while on duty, or who, being injured while on duty, shall die within one year thereafter as the result of such injury."

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman want an explanation of that?

Mr. SISSON. No; I think I understand the language. I want to call attention also to the special-delivery messenger who comes in under this clause. As I understand, the special-delivery messenger is a boy that may never have been employed in the Post Office Department a minute in his life. The postmaster sees him and he employs him and he gets 8 cents for the delivery of a package. He is covered into this class. The fourth-class postmaster has been covered in under the classified service. This includes that postmaster.

If you shall use the language "while on duty," the language might be construed to mean the hours during which the post office is open. It is true there is a saving clause over on page 5 that he must not be injured by his own negligence. But I do not believe it is contemplated that the fourth-class postmasters shall be covered by this provision—I may be mistaken—for the reason that it will take the salary paid him in the event of an injury. The fourth-class postmaster has no salary, but is paid by cancellations, and the special-delivery messenger has no salary, but is paid 8 cents, which he gets for delivering a registered package from the post office in the town or place of delivery.

Mr. MOON. This language is subject to a point of order and no other—"or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service." That is new law.

Mr. SISSON. I have directed my remarks especially to that. Now, that portion of the language to which I make the point of order is the language just read by the gentleman from Tennessee. My own judgment is that when the language is stricken out the section should be amended, and I shall offer an amendment at the proper time putting in the word "salaried" in line 10, making them salaried employees, and also in line 24, making it read "classified civil-service salaried employees."

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does this language "or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service" include all the officers and employees in the Post Office Department here in Washington?

Mr. SISSON. I think it would. I think it includes everybody in the Post Office Department under the classified service, and that was the construction placed upon it by the postal authorities.

Mr. MANN. That would give these men $2,000 and would apply to a clerk in Washington if he should die. Clerks are on duty all the time in Washington. It would not apply to the clerks in the other departments in Washington.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think the fourth-class postmaster when he closes up his office is on duty, but in the administration of this law these things have occurred to me: Suppose a man on duty as a fourth-class postmaster is selling goods and he should become injured while on duty, but not performing the duties of postmaster, there is some question whether or not he would be entitled to this amount.

Mr. MANN. The expression "in line of duty" is well defined in military service.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; that has been well defined.

Mr. MANN. If one of these clerks was in the Postmaster General's office engaged in disturbing rural routes, he would be on duty all the time. From some expressions I have heard here recently I do not think their lives are absolutely safe. [Laughter.] But what I wanted to get at is whether it was the intention to differentiate between the employees in Washington in the Post Office Department and the employees in the Agricultural Department, the State Department, the War Department, and the Interior Department.

Mr. SISSON. I think it unquestionably does. I think it virtually gives the civil-service pension to the Post Office employees when it is denied to all the others. I do not believe that it ought to be brought about in that way. In the event that we have a civil-service pension it ought to be in the open and not under the guise of insurance. I have nothing else to say, and I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a statement with respect to this.

Mr. SISSON. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. All of the language on page 4, from line 9 down to and including line 25, except the language "or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service," is permanent law. The purpose of the amendment to which the gentleman proposes to make the point of order is to include all of the men in the Postal Service under this liability law, if I may so term it, who are not already under it. In writing the law as it was originally passed, provision was made for every man in the service to be covered under it except the supervisory officers of the Post Office Department. All the supervisory officers in the Railway Mail Service——

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman refers, of course, to the Reilly amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. I refer to the law.

Mr. SISSON. It was first the Reilly amendment which was adopted, and that was in reference to railway mail clerks.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, not at all. It included all the men in the Postal Service, including the railway mail supervisory officers, and exempted from the provisions of the law the supervisory officers in the Postal Service proper. There is no reason on earth why the men who are the supervisory officers in the Post Office Department should not be entitled to equal consideration with the men who are employed in other branches of the service, and while the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] may undertake to show that this is intended as a pension, there is no such intention. It is not intended to pension anyone by this provision. It is intended to do justice to the men who are in the service who may be injured while on duty. It provides for the payment of full salaries for a year during disability, if injured, and for half salary during another year, and for the payment of $2,000 to the family of the deceased in case of death.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has devoted a lot of study to this question. Under the question raised by the gentleman from Mississippi, how would the Post Office Department arrive at how much it should pay for the messenger, in the event a messenger is killed?

Mr. MADDEN. This has nothing to do with the messengers. The messengers have already been provided for. This provides only for the supervisory officers in the department.

Mr. COX. The fourth-class postmasters have not been provided for.

Mr. MADDEN. They have not.

Mr. COX. How would the Postmaster General pay for them in the event of their death?

Mr. MADDEN. That would be a matter in the discretion of the Postmaster General. He would determine what, if any, compensation would be paid.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, there is nothing about the salaries of fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. MADDEN. There is nothing in here about anyone's salary.

Mr. MANN. There is in the first part of it, but the provision to which this alludes is a fixed amount—$2,000—and it has nothing to do with salaries.

Mr. MADDEN. It applies only to the indemnity that is to be paid to the family of the deceased, in so far as it affects those who are not working on a fixed salary, and there is no other liability with respect to the men who are not working on a fixed salary.

Mr. COX. I am seeking information.

Mr. MADDEN. And I am trying to give it.

Mr. COX. I can readily understand how the Post Office Department would adjust a settlement where the salary is fixed, as, for instance, in the case of railway postal clerks or the supervisory officials, in fact, all postal employees that have a fixed salary. That can be determined by taking one full year's salary in the event of death or 50 per cent of the salary in case they have a lingering sickness for another year.

We now come to fifty or sixty thousand four-class postmasters that have no salary at all, and the query in my mind—and it was there when the matter went into the bill in the committee—is, How would the Post Office Department arrive at how much to pay the fourth-class postmasters in the event of death or in case they suffered some injury which lasted more than one year?

Mr. MADDEN. In the event of death there would be no question whatever. Their relatives would be entitled to $2,000; but I understand the Post Office Department has ruled to the effect that with respect to the case of special-delivery messengers there is no claim if they are injured and are not able to continue on with their work because of the fact that they are not working on a fixed salary.

Now that that ruling has been made with respect to the special-delivery messengers, of course it would apply equally to the fourth-class postmasters. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] will not exercise his privilege of making this point of order. It is one of the most beneficent measures that has been suggested to the House, and affects the most patriotic men in the service of the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more, and if these gentlemen desire to ask any questions I shall be delighted to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FINLEY. The proposed law here speaks of salaries. Now, is not the money that is paid to fourth-class postmasters compensation?

Mr. MADDEN. I presume it is. I yield to my colleague now [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. I would like to ask the gentleman if the permanent liability law of which the gentleman spoke does not cover all branches of the Post Office service?

Mr. MADDEN. It covers all branches of the Post Office service now except the supervisory officials. This is intended to cover supervisory officials and anybody else who may have been forgotten, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. STERLING. Does it not cover carriers, city and rural?

Mr. MADDEN. They are all covered by the law now.

Mr. STERLING. And they are under its protection?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. Let me ask the gentleman, does the permanent liability law provide——

Mr. MADDEN. Here is the permanent liability law.

Mr. STERLING (continuing). That they shall receive pay while going to and from their duty if they should happen to be killed or injured?

Mr. MADDEN. While on duty.

Mr. STERLING. Now, the department has construed that in such a way that it does not include where the employee was going to and from his duty. Now, it ought to do so.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know what their construction of it is, but the intention of the law was that it should cover men injured while on duty, and the language has been so construed as to exempt or cut out from the operation of the law the men who are employed as substitutes, and this provision about which the gentleman from Mississippi has raised the question of order is intended to cover those men who are working as substitutes and others.

Mr. STERLING. I am sure of this. I think I remember correctly that the liability law that applies to other Government employees provides that where they are injured or killed while going to and from their duty they receive the benefit of it.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, there was a case recently decided by the Post Office authorities, where a man in Brooklyn was going from his home to his work at the post office, that he was not on duty; and I am rather inclined to think that the law should not be sufficiently broad to cover men who are on their way to their work or on their way from their work to their homes. I do not believe that men who are engaged in the Postal Service of the United States want any compensation from the Government if they are injured while they are not on duty They want to have the law strictly construed.

Mr. STERLING. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to say that they do want it. When they are going to and from their duty they are just as much in the employ of the Government as they are after they reach the place of duty. Let me say there was a case in the Brooklyn Navy Yard where a man was injured going to and from his duty. He could not recover; and in view of that fact the law was changed, giving those employees protection when on their way to and from their duty. I think this paragraph ought to be amended by inserting after the word "duty," "or when going to or returning from their duty."

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman, I would not object to an amendment in that particular, but I have not been so anxious about giving it to men while going from their homes to their work, or from their work to their homes, as in case of any injury that may occur to them while they are at work.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Can the gentleman state whether by accident, or why it was, that this most meritorious class of employees were left out of this amendment originally?

Mr. MADDEN. It was simply by accident, I will say to the gentleman, because it was intended that men in the service should be covered. It was an omission.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. STEENERSON. Was it not also for the reason that we were told the Committee on the Judiciary had a comprehensive bill to provide for compensation to employees of the Government, and therefore it would not be necessary?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; that is true, too.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. LOBECK. I notice, page 5, in lines 2, 3, and 4—

That no compensation shall be paid to any such employee for injury occasioned by his own negligence.

Mr. MADDEN. That ought to be, ought it not?

Mr. LOBECK. Wait a minute—I have found out by the operation of this item a man injured has got to prove that he was not negligent, and I know of a case of a man who for 14 months had been lying on his bed who fell out of a car through the drawbar being out of place, and he was unable to prove that he was not negligent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] be extended for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Just a moment. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LOBECK] that, of course, the department, in determining the question of liability, ought not to be technical in its ruling; that it ought to construe the law liberally, so as to give every man the opportunity of coming within its provisions if he is fairly entitled to it.

Mr. LOBECK. I can show a case where a man was injured 14 months ago by falling out of a car on the Burlington road, and where "man's inhumanity to man" has been shown by the department up here through its inspectors and through its solicitors.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me say to the gentleman that we are going to put men in who have red blood in their veins to control the Post Office Department after the 1st day of next November. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LOBECK. I want to say further that they are holdovers from your administration.

Mr. MADDEN. Good. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not quite understand the gentleman as to what classes of employees outside of the fourth-class postmasters were included in line 24.

Mr. MADDEN. The supervisory officers of the Post Office Department only.

Mr. BENNET. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. This provision of "who shall be killed while on duty, or, who, being injured while on duty," ought to be supplemented by a provision that would prevent the department doing what it is doing; that is, adopting a certain number of days in relation to men who are sick, and saying that at the end of that time, no matter how their sickness occurred, or how quickly they recover at the end of that time, they ought to be separated from the service.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the ruling of the department to the effect that a man can remain ill and unable to work for only 150 days before he is separated from the service is the most iniquitous ruling that was ever foisted on an unsuspecting public, and it ought to be remedied in some way.

Mr. BENNET. I hope the gentleman's committee will do something.

Mr. MADDEN. We are trying to remedy it as fast as we can.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I am making this point of order, first, because the special messenger was put into this law, and it was a growth from the Reilly amendment, and they gradually enlarged it, and now the special messenger who gets 8 cents for the delivery of a message, if he shall be on his way to deliver the message, and is killed gets the $2,000.

Mr. MADDEN. He does not, but his people do, and they probably need it very much.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; his people get it; but that is no argument, for God knows the world is full of people who need money. Now, one minute. In addition this includes every class of employees, if this language means anything, in the Post Office Department, whether they are paid by piecework or whether they are the fourth-class postmasters, and adds many thousands of people, and entails an enormous amount of labor and an enormous amount of work on the Post Office Department in the enforcement of this law.

If you are going into the insurance of men engaged by the Government to perform the service, then you ought to have some well-considered law, and let them go into some well-considered department of Government for the purpose of determining these questions. Here you leave it all to the Postmaster General's discretion. It was hastily conceived and put as a rider on this appropriation bill. It is not being considered, and was not at the time it was enacted into law, upon its merits, but was straddled upon this appropriation bill as a rider, and was never construed upon its merits except as a rider on this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to differ with him long enough to say that it was considered upon its merits. It is the most meritorious legislation ever enacted in the interests of the Government and of its employees, and the gentleman is thoroughly mistaken when he says there was no consideration given to it.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman and I, perhaps, differ radically as to the proposition involved in this matter, but I am not going into the discussion of that here. If I had my own way about it, the Reilly amendment would never have become a law, and therefore I want to restrict it as much as I can.

I make the point of order on the language indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STAFFORD. To what language is the point of order made?

The CHAIRMAN. On page 4, line 24, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] makes the point of order to the following language:

Or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service.

And the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: In line 10, after the words "in place of all," insert the word "salaried," so that the line shall read:

Authority to employ acting employees in place of all salaried employees.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. MOON. I reserve a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss this matter, except to say——

Mr. STEENERSON. I will make the point of order, then.

Mr. SISSON. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will allow me to explain the amendment. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in desiring to amend this bill by putting in the words "salaried employee" is to make fixed and definite the amount of money that could be paid to the employee in the event of sickness.

I do not believe that a special messenger is necessarily excluded in this language. It would be a difficult matter for anyone to determine just exactly how to enforce the provisions of the first part of this act as to paying either the special messenger or the fourth-class postmaster. It is most difficult of enforcement, and that is why I want to make whatever law we have specific and definite.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I suppose the point of order is sustained by the Chair, and if so I desire to strike out——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not sustained the point of order. The Chair would like to hear from the gentleman from Minnesota on the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, it is new legislation. It changes existing law. It does not need any argument, I take it.

Mr. SISSON. Under the Holman rule, if you put the word "salaried" there, it excludes everybody except salaried people, and thereby on its face it reduces the amount of money carried by the bill. The exclusion of every man except a salaried employee does reduce the amount of the appropriation carried in the bill, and it is manifest that it will do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairs thinks the amendment is within the Holman rule, and the point of order is overruled. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe I have been recognized to offer an amendment. I can not be taken off the floor, Mr. Chairman, by a motion to rise. I have the floor at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman insists upon it, the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I just want to have the amendment read and considered as pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 23, after the word "messenger," insert the words "post-office laborer, or."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Tennessee does not wish to make a motion to rise at the present moment——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman object to rising now, or does he want to wait until later on?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will accede to the wishes of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 17, 1916.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request for leave of absence, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 17, 1916.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Owing to important business matters demanding my presence in the Territory, I ask for an indefinite leave of absence from the sessions of the House.

Sincerely, yours, J. K. KALANIANAOLE,
Delegate from Hawaii.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. MAPES, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Ernest J. Nichols, H. R. 17157, Sixty-third Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 4506. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 322. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to sell the old post office and site thereof in the city of Dayton, Ohio.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4506. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes to-morrow after the reading of the Journal on the subject of the attacks on me by the newspapers and the indictment in New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks unanimous consent to address the House to-morrow for 30 minutes, on a personal matter, after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, would it be as convenient for the gentleman to address the House at some other time?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I will say to my friend that it is my desire to have the floor to-morrow, for the reason that perhaps I may not be able to be here for two or three days afterwards. I am of the opinion that I have the right to the floor under a question of personal privilege, if I desired to take it up in that way, but I have decided to ask the House for unanimous consent.

Mr. MOON. I do not want to interfere with the gentleman at all. I thought if it was as convenient at some other time——

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I have been delayed already——

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman, does this grow out of the impeachment matter?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. No; it is nothing at all about the impeachment. It is only a question of erroneous attacks on me by the newspapers, under which, as I understand the rule, I have a perfect right to address the House for an hour on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. MOON. I have no objection to the gentleman's request.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Tennessee expect to go ahead with the Post Office bill to-morrow?

Mr. MOON. We want to do so.

Mr. MANN. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN]?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, February 18, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 18, 1916.

The Senate met at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we have to do with Thee in the discharge of every duty of life. May the vision of Thy glory never fade from our minds as we deal with the processes of time and put ourselves in the channels of human thought. Give us that ministry from on high which will continually elevate our thoughts and refine our feelings. Bring us into sweeter fellowship one with the other and into divine communion with Thyself. May we live out our lives in the light of Thy countenance and seek to perform, first and above all, the will of God, knowing that in Thy will is all the prosperity and blessing of life. We ask for Jesus' sake. Amen.

DISPENSING WITH MORNING BUSINESS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] have given notice that they desire to speak on a certain resolution which comes over and is now on the table. They have expressed a desire to proceed with their addresses this morning. From what they tell me, their addresses will not be protracted. I rise to ask if the ordinary morning business may not be dispensed with?

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest that the Senator ask unanimous consent that it be dispensed with.

Mr. STONE. That is what I mean to do. I will put my request in that form. I ask unanimous consent that the morning business may be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall morning business be dispensed with by unanimous consent? The Chair hears no objection, and it is dispensed with. The Senator from South Dakota.

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. STERLING. I ask unanimous consent for the reading of Senate resolution 100.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 100) submitted by Mr. STERLING on the 15th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States views with anxious concern the late order of the German Admiralty that armed merchant ships of any of the entente allies, without distinction as to whether armed for merely defensive purposes or not, may be torpedoed and sunk without warning after the 29th of the present month; that such order, if put into effect, will constitute a more serious menace to the legitimate commerce of all neutral nations, and particularly to that of the United States, than any act of any of the belligerents in the present European war, and will be in contravention of a right long recognized by the principal commercial nations of the world, including our own; that the protection of the interests of neutral commerce on the high seas in time of war has been the subject of many treaties and conventions and is a favored subject in international law, and that through these instrumentalities the freedom of such commerce and the cause of civilization itself have been greatly promoted; that any recognition on the part of the United States of the claim that the necessities of war in general or the exigencies and conditions of modern submarine warfare are warrant for the order of the German Admiralty would be a step backward, and so far an abandonment of our contention for the freedom of the seas. Moreover, such recognition would contravene the policy of the Government of the United States as expressed in the notes of our State Department to the British and German Governments, respectively, on the 26th of September and November 7, 1914; and that at this time, in the history of the present war, there should be no acquiescence in the order of the German Admiralty on the part of this or any other neutral power.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I will ask that I may be allowed to proceed with my remarks without interruption.

Mr. President, at the time of introducing this resolution I thought it appropriate that the Senate give some expression of its opinion in regard to our latest and, as it seemed to me, under all the conditions, our gravest international crisis.

The developments since the resolution was introduced have, to some extent, allayed the anxiety felt at that time, for, notwithstanding every sign and intimation given out through the press to the contrary, we are informed, through the press of last Wednesday, that—

> While surprise was expressed regarding the semiofficial disclosure of the position of the Government, officials were quick to say that they themselves were surprised that the attitude of this Government should have been misunderstood anywhere, and surprised also that the impression should have become current that the Government would alter the existing international law regarding armed merchantmen and attempt to change the law during the war without the assent of the contending belligerents.

The "semiofficial disclosure" referred to included the statement that it was not the Government's intention to alter the rules of existing international law relating to the rights of armed merchantmen.

So the Government was delaying and hesitating while the world was wondering, and admittedly the "impression became current" that we were about to accede to the German admiralty declaration and consent that the armed merchantman should, for all the purposes of attack and war upon it, have the status of a man-of-war.

I confess to have shared in that "current impression," and, entertaining the view that such a course would be a great mistake and involve consequences more serious than any that had yet disturbed us, grave as some of them have been, I offered the resolution.

There has been some clearing of the atmosphere; but there yet remain some principles concerning which there may be doubt, and which may be appropriately considered under the resolution.

It is not a remote inference that the present attitude of the German admiralty in regard to the right to attack and destroy armed merchantmen without warning was encouraged, if not invited, by the memorandum of our State Department to the entente powers. One paragraph of that memorandum, according to press report, is in words as follows:

> I should add that my Government is impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying armament of any sort, in view of the character of the submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of underseas craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government, and is seriously considering instructing its officials accordingly.

Mr. President, I appreciate the difficulties of diplomacy in these trying and perilous times, and whether the policy of this administration has been from the beginning of the war well defined and certain or whether it has been vague and vacillating; whether it has been firm, consistent, and strong; or whether through one influence or another it has at first appeared bold and uncompromising in behalf of a great principle, but in the end has yielded the substance for the word, I shall not here attempt to say nor stop to analyze. But there is some record of what has transpired in our conduct of foreign affairs during the last 18 months. That record any man may read and in the light of history and world affairs may draw his own conclusions.

But, Mr. President, the paragraph from the memorandum of the State Department suggests a dangerous and vicious principle. Without reference to any nation here involved the proposal therein contained would subordinate the interests of commerce to the interests of the submarine and, in consequence, to the interests of that nation whose strength on the high seas lay in the superiority of her submarine fleet. Under the operation of this principle the legitimate commerce of a half dozen other opposing nations as between themselves as well as their commerce with neutral nations carried in enemy merchantmen might if wholly defenseless be made the easy prey of that power which was superior in submarine strength and which chose to be remorseless in its use.

Less than two weeks from this time, according to the new declarations of the central powers, the commanders of their submarines will consider armed merchant ships of the entente allies to be warships and will treat them accordingly. Under the rules of international law an enemy warship may be torpedoed and sunk with all on board without warning or notice. It is not necessary that it be in action to warrant such procedure. It may be lying peacefully at anchor, its situation such as in no way to endanger the lives or property of the enemy army or fleet or enemy civilians. But it is a warship; its mission is to fight, and though now at rest it has potentialities of destruction and loss, and this is warrant for its destruction, accomplished by surprise or by stealth as well as in open action.

But no such right has ever existed in regard to armed merchantmen belonging to citizens of one of the belligerents. From early times they have been permitted to arm for defensive purposes. The practice may have had its origin when piracy on the high seas was more prevalent than now; but, even so, usage and international law founded on the necessities of commerce have authorized such armament for the purpose of resisting not only piratical attack but the attack as well of an enemy vessel, whether merchantman or man-of-war.

It is only when attacked that, under the rule, the merchant vessel may resist. The demand to come to a stop for the purposes of search is not an attack; the shot across the bow is not an attack, but a warning, to which armed resistance by the merchantman would not be lawful. It is only when attacked and the purpose to injure, kill, or destroy is evident that the merchant vessel may open with her guns.

The rule was in the interest of legitimate commerce, for if by reason of her armament she made successful resistance, or because of knowledge of her armament no attack was made on the merchant vessel, it was so much saved or gained for that commerce, which itself grew out of peaceful pursuits and in turn ministered to the arts of peace.

Mr. President, the principle of the right of merchantmen to arm for defensive purposes is too old, too well established, and has proven too wholesome in the interests of commerce for this Government now, in the interests of a new and terrible engine of war, but which has a certain "defensive weakness," to be persuaded or cajoled into a surrender of the principle.

The rule and the precedents are found in numerous authorities. Oppenheim, in Volume II, section 85, states it as follows:

> In a sense the crews of merchantmen owned by subjects of the belligerents belong to the latter's armed forces. For those vessels are liable to be seized by enemy men-of-war, and if attacked for that purpose they can defend themselves, can return the attack, and eventually seize the attacking men-of-war. The crews of merchantmen become in such cases combatants and enjoy all the privileges of the members of armed forces. But unless attacked they must not commit hostilities, and if they do so they are liable to be treated as criminals, just like private individuals committing hostilities in land warfare.

Hall, in his work on International Law, page 524, sixth edition, states, in effect, the same principle, as follows:

> Noncommissioned vessels have a right to resist when summoned to surrender to public ships or privateers of the enemy. The crews, therefore which make such resistance have belligerent privileges; and it is a natural consequence of the legitimateness of their acts that, if they succeed in capturing their assailant, the capture is a good one for the purpose of changing the ownership of the property taken and making the enemies prisoners of war.

By noncommissioned ships is evidently meant private, in contradistinction to public ships, to which class, of course, all naval or war vessels of the Government belong. Hall refers to the contention of some writers that a noncommissioned ship has also a right to attack, and cites Wheaton as authority for the proposition. But note at least how broad the rule laid down by Hall, that the vessel need not wait for actual attack, but that the right to resist follows the summons to surrender.

Our own Supreme Court applied the principle in two noted cases early in the history of our Government. The cases recognize the right of a merchantman to be armed for defensive purposes and show how jealously the court guarded the interests of neutral commerce. The cases were those of the Nereide and Atalanta. The Nereide was a British armed ship mounting 10 guns and was under charter by a Spanish subject. She was captured by a United States privateer after an action lasting 15 minutes. A part of the cargo was owned by a neutral, who made claim for the same, and the question in the case was whether a neutral might put the goods on board an armed belligerent merchantman. The court, speaking by Chief Justice Marshall, held that the belligerent had a perfect right to arm in his own defense and this did not interfere with that of the neutral to transport his goods in a belligerent vessel.

The case of the Atalanta, decided in 1818 by the same great jurist, rested on similar facts. The capture was by the United States man-of-war, The Wasp. The cargo, which was condemned as prize, was claimed by a French merchant, but on appeal to the Circuit Court restitution was decreed and the decree was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. According to the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Johnson in this case the hostile vessel had a right to resist. "It did not impair any right of search, or of capture, or of adjudication. The right of capture applied only to enemy ships or goods; the right of search to enemy goods on board a neutral carrier. Neither of these rights was impaired. Nor was the right of adjudication impaired. The neutral did not deny the right of the belligerent to decide the question of proprietary interest. If the property was really neutral, it did not matter to the belligerent who carried it," and our court has held that there is no valid distinction between the right of a neutral merchant to load his goods on board an enemy merchant ship and the act of a neutral merchant who ships his goods in an armed vessel belonging to the enemy. The opinion of Chief Justice Marshall is "that a neutral merchant has a right to charter and load his goods on board a belligerent armed vessel without forfeiting his neutral character." In this respect our own court, in its desire to protect neutral commerce, has gone beyond the English authorities, it having been there held that if the neutral "puts his goods on board a ship of force which he has every reason to presume will be defended against the enemy by that force, the case then becomes very different. He betrays an intention to resist visitation and search which he could not do by putting them on a mere merchant vessel, and so far as he does this he adheres to the belligerent. If a party acts in association with a hostile force—and this, I suppose, would apply to an enemy convoy—and relies upon that force for protection, he is for that occasion to be considered as an enemy."

But, when the English court speaks of a "ship of force," it does not mean a merchantman armed simply for defensive purposes but refers in such language to a man-of-war or to a vessel armed and equipped for offensive purposes. English practice and decisions are in accordance with the generally accepted rule.

The case of Hooper against United States, decided by the Court of Claims in 1887, was one of the French spoliation cases, and it was there laid down that the arming of a merchant vessel strictly for defense whose only object was trade did not authorize condemnation even if a license under acts of Congress were found on board.

The license of the act of Congress might import a national character, and if there was reason at all for regarding it as not entitled to be armed, it would be because it had that license from the Government.

In Cushing against United States, another French spoliation case, the same principle is laid down. The court quotes approvingly from the opinion of Judge Bee, of the district court of South Carolina, in a case decided in 1795, as follows:

> The laws of neutrality and nations, in no instance that I know of, interdict neutral vessels from going to sea armed and fitted for defensive war. All American Indiamen are armed, and it is necessary they should be so. When the wisdom of Congress substituted an embargo for a declaration of hostilities preparations of this sort might have been seen in every State in the Union. From the instructions and circular letter to the different collectors it was clear that the vessels of the belligerent powers alone were comprehended in the restrictions. Even they might arm for defense; and if, as respected French vessels, it should appear doubtful whether their equipment was applicable to war or commerce, such equipment was declared lawful.

It might be fairly said that by implication the right of an armed merchant vessel to arm for defensive purposes is recognized by our own statute relative to neutrality. Section 5289, Revised Statutes, provides that the—> owners or consignees of every armed vessel sailing out of the ports of the United States, belonging wholly or in part to citizens thereof, shall, before clearing out the same, give bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties, in double the amount of the value of the vessel and cargo on board, including her armament, conditioned that the vessel shall not be employed by such owners to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace.

The statute, it will be seen, applies to vessels belonging in whole or in part to citizens of the United States. It does not prevent them from arming the vessel; and the statute applies only to armed vessels. Nor does it prohibit them from resisting attack by an enemy armed vessel, or, for that matter, from making an attack on such vessel. The owners, being private owners and citizens of the United States, and the vessel being armed, are, in effect, under bonds to keep the peace as to the vessel of any nation with which the United States is at peace.

The opinion in the case of United States v. Quincy (6 Pet., 466), while brought under a penal statute forbidding the fitting out and arming of any ship or vessel for the purpose of committing hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign State or people with whom the United States are at peace, is a fair construction of section 5289, and is important in showing the emphasis put upon the needs of commerce in the decision. I quote therefrom as follows:

> The law does not prohibit armed vessels belonging to citizens of the United States from sailing out of our ports; it only requires the owners to give security (as was done in the present case) that such vessels shall not be employed by them to commit hostilities against foreign powers at peace with the United States.
> The collectors are not authorized to detain vessels, although manifestly built for warlike purposes and about to depart from the United States, unless circumstances shall render it probable that such vessels are intended to be employed by the owners to commit hostilities against some foreign power at peace with the United States.

Here is that clause in the decision to which I call especial attention because of its emphasis of the needs of commerce:

> All the latitude, therefore, necessary for commercial purposes is given to our citizens; and they are restrained only from such acts as are calculated to involve the country in war.

And now, Mr. President, supported by these clear rules of international law and these decisions of the courts in which they are applied and enforced, come the almost "up-to-date" pronouncements of our own State Department.

The correspondence between the Government of Great Britain and our own in the autumn of 1914, after the breaking out of the war, shows entire acquiescence in the position of Great Britain that her merchantmen might be armed for defensive purposes and that it would not be "in accordance with neutrality and international law to detain in neutral ports merchant vessels armed with purely defensive armaments." Let me read from a memorandum from the British Embassy here made September 9, 1914, valuable for the authorities it cites:

> The German Government have openly entered upon the policy of arming merchant ships as commerce destroyers and even claim the right to carry out the process of arming and equipping such merchant ships in neutral harbors or on the high seas. It is in consequence of this that the British Admiralty have been compelled, in accordance with the practice following in the great wars of history, to arm a certain number of British merchant ships for self-defense only.
> The practice of arming ships in self-defense—

Says this memorandum—

> is very old and has been ordered by royal proclamations in England from early in the seventeenth century. During the Napoleonic wars the right to arm in self-defense was recognized by British and United States prize courts in the cases of the Catherine Elizabeth (British) and the Nereide (United States). The right of a merchant ship of a belligerent to carry arms and resist capture is clearly and definitely laid down in modern times. The right of resistance of merchant vessels is recognized by the United States naval war code, by the Italian code for mercantile marine, and by the Russian prize regulations. Writers of authority in many European countries also recognize the right. To mention a German authority, it may be stated that the late Dr. Perels, at one time legal adviser to the German Admiralty, quotes with approval article 10 of the United States naval war code, which states "the prisoners of merchant vessels of an enemy who, in self-defense and in protection of the vessel placed in their charge, resist an attack are entitled to the status of prisoners of war."

And that in itself recognizes the principle of the right of a merchantman to arm for defensive purposes.

> The Institute of International Law at its meeting in 1913 prepared and adopted a manual of the laws of naval warfare, article 10 of which expressly declared that private ships are allowed to employ force to defend themselves against the attack of an enemy's ship.

And on November 7, 1914, in answer to the protest of the German foreign office against our rule permitting ships of belligerent nations, though armed for defensive purposes only, to be treated as merchant ships, the then acting and our now esteemed Secretary of State replied in part as follows:

> Your 515, October 15. The Government of the United States is obliged to dissent from the views of the German Government as expressed in your telegram in regard to the treatment to be accorded armed merchant vessels of belligerent nationality in neutral ports. The practice of a majority of nations and the consensus of opinion by the leading authorities on international law, including many German writers, support the proposition that merchant vessels may arm for defense without losing their private character and that they may employ such armament against hostile attack without contravening the principles of international law.

As long as the right to arm a merchant vessel for defensive purposes exists nothing can more surely safeguard the interests of ourselves as a neutral nation and of all belligerent nations than those set forth in the circular of the State Department with reference to the status of armed merchant vessels. One might complain of their strictness, as, for example, I do not see why under a rule permitting a vessel to arm for defensive purposes the presence of an armament and ammunition on board a merchant vessel should create a presumption that the armament is for offensive purposes, other signs and outward appearances denoting that she was not a war vessel.

Without reading I submit this circular and ask that it may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The circular referred to is as follows:

CIRCULAR OF THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE OF THE UNITED STATES WITH REFERENCE TO THE STATUS OF ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS.

(Issued September 19, 1914.)

(A) A merchant vessel of belligerent nationality may carry an armament and ammunition for the sole purpose of defense without acquiring the character of a ship of war.

(B) The presence of an armament and ammunition on board a merchant vessel creates a presumption that the armament is for offensive purposes, but the owners or agents may overcome this presumption by evidence showing that the vessel carries armament solely for defense.

(C) Evidence necessary to establish the fact that the armament is solely for defense and will not be used offensively, whether the armament be mounted or stowed below, must be presented in each case independently at an official investigation. The result of the investigation must show conclusively that the armament is not intended for and will not be used in offensive operations.

Indications that the armament will not be used offensively are:

1. That the caliber of the guns carried does not exceed 6 inches.
2. That the guns and small arms carried are few in number.
3. That no guns are mounted on the forward part of the vessel.
4. That the quantity of ammunition carried is small.
5. That the vessel is manned by its usual crew and the officers are the same as those on board before war was declared.
6. That the vessel intends to and actually does clear for a port lying in its usual trade route or a port indicating its purpose to continue in the same trade in which it was engaged before war was declared.
7. That the vessel takes on board fuel and supplies sufficient only to carry it to its port of destination, or the same quantity substantially which it has been accustomed to take for a voyage before war was declared.

8. That the cargo of the vessel consists of articles of commerce unsuited for the use of a ship of war in operations against an enemy.

9. That the vessel carries passengers who are as a whole unfitted to enter the military or naval service of the belligerent whose flag the vessel flies, or of any of its allies, and particularly if the passenger list includes women and children.

10. That the speed of the ship is slow.

(D) Port authorities, on the arrival in a port of the United States of an armed vessel of belligerent nationalitiy claiming to be a merchant vessel should immediately investigate and report to Washington on the foregoing indications as to the intended use of the armament, in order that it may be determined whether the evidence is sufficient to remove the presumption that the vessel is and should be treated as a ship of war. Clearance will not be granted until authorized from Washington, and the master will be so informed upon arrival.

(E) The conversion of a merchant vessel into a ship of war is a question of fact which is to be established by direct or circumstantial evidence of intention to use the vessel as a ship of war.

Mr. STERLING. If it be said that some of these decisions are old and that the practice of arming merchantmen has fallen into desuetude, I reply that the last assertion of the principle—the right—is not old; the latest text writers on international law announce it as present-day law, and our State Department treats it, as I have shown, as one of the rules of international law, as much so as that rule which forbids the invasion of neutral territory by the armed forces of a belligerent.

Shall we deny to Great Britain now the right to arm her merchant fleet in the way prescribed by the British Admiralty, as explained by Mr. Winston Churchill less than a year ago in the House of Commons? He said:

They are armed solely for defensive purposes. The guns are mounted in the stern and can only fire on a pursuer. Vessels so armed have nothing in common with merchant vessels taken over by the Admiralty and converted into commissioned auxiliary cruisers, nor are these vessels privateers or commerce destroyers in any sense. They are exclusively ships which carry food to this country * * * and the instructions of these armed merchant vessels will direct them to surrender if overtaken by ships of war. They are, however, thoroughly capable of self-defense against an enemy's armed merchantman. The fact of their being so armed will probably prove an effective deterrent alone on the depredations of armed merchantmen and an effective protection for these ships and for the vital supplies they carry.

Mr. President, of all the peoples in the wide world, it ill becomes us to deny Great Britain that right now or to spend one hour in diplomatic haggling to secure her renunciation of it. Our export trade has been growing by leaps and bounds. Each month has been exceeding by many millions the last preceding month. The manufacturers of arms and munitions of war are not the only beneficiaries but the products of the farm, the forest, the mine, find a foreign demand and market never in the aggregate equaled. But with our own poor and inadequate merchant marine, how would it have been were England not mistress of the seas? Or suppose the ships flying the American flag were multiplied many times and the naval strength of the respective belligereuts now at war were nearly matched; what of the annoyances, what of the desperate complications, the injury to trade, the chances of war as compared with the grievances suffered from England now and against which we so loudly protest, although assured of reparation for every material or pecuniary loss which she may inflict by reason of the exigencies of war—and she has caused loss of no other kind. At a banquet given by the city of Ghent to the commissioners who joined in the treaty, John Quincy Adams said:

To the city of peace; may the doors of the Temple of Janus here closed be not opened again for a hundred years.

Nor have they been; although the treaty of Ghent itself settled nothing save the war of 1812. The cause for which the war was fought, together with the boundaries to the northeast and the northwest, the fisheries, the Oregon question, the question of disarmament on the Great Lakes, any one of which might easily have been casus belli between nations not of common origin and speech and institutions and ideals, were all, with a hundred more, settled peacefully by diplomacy or by arbitration. The hundred years have passed and the doors of Janus are still closed. God grant they may never be opened.

But, Mr. President, can we be "impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying armament of any sort, in view of the character of submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of underseas craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government"?

Is it reasonable, then, that a British or French merchant vessel carrying four small guns astern for defensive purposes and bringing their cargoes of British or French goods for consumption by our people and ready to carry away food supplies produced by our people for their people or their armies—is it reasonable because of the "defensive weakness" of any murderous underseas craft that we should treat them as war ships and intern them during the war in our ports, neither receiving the goods they carry nor selling them ours—and all because of the defensive weakness of the favored submarine?

Mr. President, I am not insensible of the fact that some may be moved to favor this policy on grounds of humanity, the saving of life, and I sympathize most deeply with such a motive; but the record of the past does not give assurance that the human cargo on unarmed vessels will be protected. Moreover, another "weakness" of the submarine is its inability to furnish a crew to bring the vessel into port—and if so under present conditions, what port? It can not tow the vessel into any port. Its mission, then, is to destroy the vessel. It claims the right under international law. To do this it orders passengers to take to the boats, and there may be thousands of them—and there they are on the open sea, in a gale, far from land, all for a chance to destroy an enemy ship which carries neutral passengers and commerce as well as enemy commerce.

The vice of the suggestion of the State Department lies in this: That because the deadly submarine is not strong on defense you must therefore make the merchant ship absolutely helpless against the submarine.

And so it is on such reasoning that a late invention, the most deadly in its sea operations that can be conceived, was about to be accorded, it was feared, exemption against defense and full freedom without fear of injury on the part of its officers and crew to set adrift, exposed to the perils of the sea, its noncombatant and neutral passengers, and then without hearing or judgment of prize court send the argosy itself, richly laden with the produce of a neutral land on its way to feed and clothe those of perhaps another neutral land, to the bottom of the ocean.

Admit that such reasoning is right and that such a principle should prevail and you go back to the Middle Ages or beyond and set at naught the work of all the conventions and treaties and all the labors of all the international jurists for the protection of neutral trade from Grotius down to the present time. No; instead of yielding to the claims of the admiralty their very mention should meet with vigorous protest. Instead of denying this old right of the seas we should now of all times vie with Great Britain or any other nation in seeking to uphold it. It is possible some danger will be incurred, but I do not much fear dangers will be increased beyond what they are at present. But I do know that let another sea horror occur in which American lives are involved and this administration and the world will know that there is a real America, not supine, apathetic, and hesitating, but strong, militant, if need be, and ready to respond to those noble impulses of liberty and humanity which have been our heritage from the beginning. If, perchance, the wantonness and inhumanity of others shall yet cost us something, the sacrifice may not have been in vain. For, to peace commissioners, to delegates to The Hague conventions, to international jurists, there will be committed a new problem and a new cause, and that will be to limit the hostile operations, at least the destructive operations, of the murderous submarine to war craft, be it dreadnought, cruiser, torpedo boat, or strictly naval auxiliary, and to prohibit forever the destruction of commerce and passenger carrying vessels by means and at risks that shock humanity and shame our civilization.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can not hope to add anything to the admirable and forcible argument to which the Senate has just listened, but the question involved in the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is of such very great importance that I think it can do no harm if, in my own way, I briefly reiterate some of the arguments which he has so well and strongly presented.

There have been reports lately in the newspapers and also some discussion in the press as to the question of armed merchantmen. There have also been unofficial intimations that the administration was considering a change of the attitude of this Government upon the subject. Indeed, this has gone so far that there was printed in the Chicago Herald what purported to be a note from our Government addressed to belligerents in regard to the status of the armed merchantman. I am aware that this publication is not official, but we have fallen under this administration into the deplorable practice of receiving all our communications as to foreign relations through the newspapers. It is very difficult to believe that this letter, which I shall not read in full, but which I shall ask to have printed at this point as a part of my remarks, can be correctly given.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the article referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears none.

The article referred to is as follows:

NEW UNITED STATES NOTE DENIES RIGHT TO ARM LINERS FOR DEFENSE—USE OF SUBMARINES IS UPHELD.

The Chicago Herald presents herewith the note which, by direction of the Secretary of State, American ambassadors addressed to the European belligerents in connection with the recognition of submarines as commerce destroyers and the desirability of the disarmament of belligerent merchantmen.

The note was dated January 18, and has been received by the Herald from a European correspondent. Its text is as follows:

"It is a matter of the deepest interest to my Government to bring to an end, if possible, the dangers of life which attend the use of submarines as at present employed in destroying enemy commerce on the high seas, since on any merchant vessel of belligerent nationality there may be citizens of the United States who have taken passage or members of the crew in the exercise of their recognized rights as neutrals. I assume your Government is equally solicitous to protect their nationals from the exceptional hazards which are presented by their passage on merchant vessels through these portions of the high seas in which undersea craft of the enemy are operating.

UPHOLDS SUBMARINES' USE.

"While I am fully alive to the appalling loss of life among noncombatants, regardless of age or sex, which has resulted from the present method of destroying merchant vessels without removing the persons on board to places of safety, and while I view that practice as contrary to those humane principles which should control belligerents in the conduct of their naval operations, I do not feel that a belligerent should be deprived of the proper use of submarines in the invasion of commerce, since those instruments of war have proved their effectiveness in this practical branch of warfare on the high seas.

"In order to bring submarine warfare within the general rules of international law and the principles of humanity without destroying their efficiency in their destruction of commerce, I believe that a formula may be found which, though it may require slight modification of the precedent generally followed by nations prior to the employment of the submarines, will appeal to the sense of justice and fairness of all the belligerents in the present war.

"Your Government will understand that in seeking the formula or rule of this nature I approach it of necessity from the point of view of a neutral, but I believe that it will be equally efficacious in preserving the lives of noncombatants on merchant vessels of belligerent nationalities.

BASIS OF PROPOSALS.

"My comments on this subject are predicated on the following propositions:

"First. A noncombatant has a right to traverse the high seas in a merchant vessel entitled to fly a belligerent flag, to rely upon the observance of the rules of international law and principles of humanity, and if the vessel is approached by a naval vessel of another belligerent, the merchant vessel of enemy nationality should not be attacked without being ordered to stop.

"Second. An enemy merchant vessel, when ordered to do so by a belligerent submarine, should immediately stop.

"Third. Such vessel should not be attacked after being ordered to stop unless it attempts to flee or to resist. In case it ceases to flee or resist, the attack should be discontinued.

"Fourth. In the event that it is impossible to place a prize crew on board of an enemy merchant vessel or to convoy it into port, the vessel may be sunk, provided the crew and passengers have been removed to a place of safety.

OBSTACLES FOR SUBMARINES.

"In complying with the foregoing principles, which, in my opinion, embody the principal rule, the strict observance of which will insure the life of a noncombatant on a merchant vessel which is intercepted by a submarine, I am not unmindful of the obstacles which would be met by undersea craft as commerce destroyers.

"Prior to the year 1915 belligerent operations against enemy commerce on the high seas had been conducted with cruisers carrying heavy armaments. In these conditions international law appeared to permit a merchant vessel to carry armament for defensive purposes without lessening its character as a private merchant vessel. This right seems to have been predicated on the superior defensive strength of ships of war, and the limitation of armament to have been dependent on the fact that it could not be used effectively in offense against enemy naval vessels, while it could defend the merchantmen against the generally inferior armament of piratical ships and privateers.

POWERLESS IN DEFENSE.

"The use of the submarine, however, has changed these relations. Comparison of the defensive strength of a cruiser and a submarine shows that the latter, relying for protection on its power to submerge, is almost defenseless in point of construction. Even a merchant ship carrying a small-caliber gun would be able to use it effectively for offense against the submarine.

"Moreover, pirates and sea rovers have been swept from the main trade channels of the sea and privateering has been abolished. Consequently the placing of guns on merchantmen at the present date of submarine warfare can be explained only on the ground of a purpose to render merchantmen superior in force to submarines and to prevent warning and visit and search by them. Any armament, therefore, on a merchant vessel would seem to have the character of an offensive armament.

"If a submarine is required to stop and search a merchant vessel on the high seas, and in case it is found that she is of an enemy character and that conditions necessitate her destruction and the removal to a place of safety of persons on board, it would not seem just nor reasonable that the submarine should be compelled, while complying with these requirements, to expose itself to almost certain destruction by the guns on board the merchant vessel.

INNOCENT LIVES AT STAKE.

"It would, therefore, appear to be a reasonable and reciprocally just arrangement if it could be agreed by the opposing belligerents that submarines should be caused to adhere strictly to the rules of international law in the matter of stopping and searching merchant vessels, determining their belligerent nationality, and removing the crews and passengers to places of safety before sinking the vessels as prizes of war, and that merchant vessels of belligerent nationality should be prohibited from carrying any armament whatsoever.

"In proposing this formula as a basis of conditional declarations by the belligerent Government, I do so in the full conviction that each Government will consider primarily the humane purposes of saving the lives of innocent people rather than the insistence upon doubtful legal rights which may be denied on account of new conditions.

STAND ON QUESTION SOUGHT.

"I would be pleased to be informed whether your Government would be willing to make such a declaration conditioned upon their enemies making a similar declaration.

"I should add that my Government is impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying an armament of any sort, in view of the character of the submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of undersea craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government and is seriously considering instructing its officials accordingly."

Mr. LODGE. I repeat, Mr. President, that it is difficult to believe that this note can be correctly given. It is a hesitating and faltering argument in behalf of clearing away all the laws which have been established by the general assent of civilized nations and by the dictates of humanity in favor of the protection of the lives of neutrals who may have taken passage on a belligerent merchantman. It contains, moreover, one or two statements which it seems incredible should have been put forward by the very accomplished international lawyer who is now our Secretary of State, as, for instance, when he says, according to the newspaper report, that:

Moreover, pirates and sea rovers have been swept from the main trade channels of the sea and privateering has been abolished. Consequently, the placing of guns on merchantmen at the present date of submarine warfare can be explained only on the ground of a purpose to render merchantmen superior in force to submarines and to prevent warning and visit and search by them.

The Secretary of State must be perfectly aware that the arming of merchantmen for defensive purposes was not confined to defense against pirates and privateers. Nothing is better settled, as I shall show, than that it carried the defense of the belligerent merchantman in case of war against the enemies of its country.

Very recently, it must be said—within the last few days, indeed—contradictions of these reports and of the ground taken in this note, which I have asked to have printed, have appeared; but we have no official information in regard to the matter, and the question is one of such gravity and the issues involved are so serious that I shall venture briefly to call the attention of the Senate to the well-established laws of nations in regard to armed merchantmen and the consistent attitude of this country with reference to this question from the establishment of the Government to the present time.

The armed merchantman—that is, the ship engaged primarily in trade, but carrying armament for its own defense—goes back to a very remote period. The traders of the Mediterranean in the Middle Ages were all armed, because in the unsettled conditions of that time and in waters infested by Barbary pirates a defenseless trader would have had no chance of survival. After Vasco da Gama had rounded the Cape of Good Hope and opened the route to the Far East, after Columbus had discovered America and shown the road to the new West, the merchantmen of Europe began to make their way into these vast regions hitherto unknown. Every voyage was an adventure, and every trader was an explorer and discoverer. The bold men who in search of the profits of commerce made their way into these unknown seas went armed; no other course was possible. They were likely to encounter pirates, savages, and hostile nations, and their safety depended on nothing but their own powers of combat and defense. As the centuries passed trade routes were established and regular lines of commerce were opened, but the dangers encountered by merchantmen in traversing the Pacific and in making their way among the islands of the Orient and of the southern seas were but little diminished. To these perils were added as time went on dangers from the development of privateers whenever there was war between the nations of Europe. Armed merchantmen therefore became of great moment to the commerce of every country. To illustrate the importance attached to this situation it may be noted that the arming of merchantmen was made compulsory in England in the seventeenth century. In 1625 Charles I issued a proclamation compelling merchantmen to arm, and an order in council, under Charles II, on the 14th of December, 1672, made it compulsory upon all merchantmen to be properly armed for self-defense. Similar orders were issued in the eighteenth century so as to save the necessity of convoy, which, of course, limited the possibilities of trade. Under these conditions there grew up as a matter of course a body of law defining the character of armed merchantmen. This practice of arming merchantmen went on with fluctuations, and was so generally recognized that in 1815 Chief Justice Marshall said, in a case to which I shall refer later and more fully:

In point of fact, it is believed that a belligerent merchant vessel rarely sails unarmed.

Nor did this practice of arming end at that time with the Napoleonic Wars. It continued through a large part of the nineteenth century. The New England clipper ships which in such large numbers carried on the East Indian and China trade during the first half of the nineteenth century all went armed, for they were exposed not only to dangers among the savages of Polynesia but to those which arose from the swarms of Chinese pirate junks, which infested the China seas. In many families in New England to-day there are preserved specimens of the old chests of muskets which these merchantmen carried. They often had carronades to repel the assaults of pirates attacking them in small boats, and not infrequently they carried a brass gun, familiarly known as a "Long Tom." I well remember as a boy seeing on the ships owned by my father, which were engaged in the China trade, these long chests filled with muskets and placed in positions convenient for use in time of danger.

I have briefly described these conditions because, in the centuries during which they existed, they gave rise to a body of international law in which the rules affecting the status of the armed merchantmen were probably better defined by the general usage and assent of nations than in almost any department of international jurisprudence. It was established by practice and by universal assent that a merchantman armed only for defense did not thereby lose her character as a merchantman, and that when war existed the armed merchantmen, both of the belligerent and the neutral, retained all the privileges and rights which belonged to the merchantman when entirely unarmed. I shall not, however, enter upon a general survey of the codes or the opinions and practice of other nations in this respect. I shall content myself with tracing as briefly as I can the course and the position of the United States upon this very important matter. There was never any doubt as to the broad rule that a merchantman armed for defense did not lose her character as a peaceful trader. The only point to be determined was whether by her acts or by the character of her armament and the numbers of her crew she was within the rules applying to the merchantmen or whether she had taken herself out of those rules and had come within the class of the ship of war or the privateer. It was universally agreed by all authorities that the armament of the merchantman could be used only in self-defense, although that self-defense might extend to capturing the vessel which attacked. If an armed merchantman took the offensive she at once passed out of the category of merchantmen and not having any commission or letters of marque, like a privateer, she would have been treated not merely as a ship of war but would have been within range of the definition of piracy.

The first qualification, therefore, was that the armament of the merchantman could be used only for defense. The next qualification was the character of the armament, and that had to be determined in each case. It was a question of fact. No exact line as to the amount of armament had ever been drawn. In the case of the Charming Betsy (2d Cranch, 120–121), Chief Justice Marshall said:

> The degree of arming which should bring a vessel within this description has not been ascertained, and perhaps it would be difficult precisely to mark the limits, the passing of which would bring a captured vessel within the description of the acts of Congress on this subject.

This probably expresses the exact state of the law of that period. With the changes which time has brought there have been alterations, of course, in the arming of merchantmen, but the principles have remained unchanged. For example, Prof. Snow, in his International Law, said in 1888:

> It may be reasonably expected in coming naval wars that steamers of the great mail lines will be armed so as to defend themselves from attack rather than seek convoy, and the defense will be legitimately carried to the point of seizure of the attacking vessel or a recapture if once taken. Without a proper commission a private vessel, however, should act only directly or indirectly on the defensive, and not go out of the way to capture enemy vessels. It can not, of course, take any belligerent action toward vessels of a neutral power. (P. 83.)

This statement may be taken as embodying the rule generally acknowledged by English and American judges and writers. The same principles are recognized in the different codes with reference to the armed merchant ships of belligerents, with which I am here alone concerned. The Italian Code of 1877 says:

> Merchantmen, on being attacked by other vessels, including war vessels, may defend themselves against and even seize them.

The Russian Prize Regulations of 1895 say:

> The right to stop, examine, and seize hostile or suspected vessels and cargoes belongs to the ships of the Imperial Navy. Vessels of the mercantile navy have a right to do so only when they are attacked by hostile or suspected vessels.

The United States Naval War Code of 1900 says:

> The personnel of merchant vessels of an enemy, who, in self-defense and in protection of the vessel placed in their charge resist an attack are entitled if captured to the status of prisoners of war.

The right of a belligerent merchantman to defend itself is also recognized by writers of weight and authority of our own and of other countries. The Institute of International Law, at its meeting at Oxford in 1913, laid down the following rule:

> It is always permitted, both to public and private ships, to employ force to defend themselves against the attack of an enemy.

That general statement of the Institute shows that the defense of the merchantman is not confined to pirate and privateer. "Attack of an enemy" is the expression used, and that means the enemy in war.

I make brief reference to these codes merely to demonstrate that the broad principle established in past centuries as to the right of a merchantman to be armed without thereby losing its character has not changed in modern times with the new conditions of modern commerce and warfare.

I now come to the more important question which most immediately concerns us, the right of a neutral to ship cargo or take passage on the merchantman of a belligerent in time of war, when that merchantman is armed solely for self-defense, the authorities all holding that the arming does not alter the character of the vessel. The most important decision is given in the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of the Nereide (9 Cranch, 388). I should like to read the whole decision to the Senate, for it is a most masterly opinion. I should particularly like to read the paragraph at the end where, in describing the brilliant argument of Mr. Pinkney, the great Chief Justice displays the humor and satire of which he was capable but which he rarely used. There were many points in the decision, however, which do not concern the immediate question, so I shall confine myself to quoting that portion of it which treats of the rights of a neutral to ship goods or take passage on an armed belligerent merchantman. The principles laid down by Chief Justice Marshall are, I may say, just as applicable to-day as they were then, for they rest on the broadest doctrines of law.

Chief Justice Marshall says:

> The next point to be considered is the right of a neutral to place his goods on board an armed belligerent merchantman.
> That a neutral may lawfully put his goods on board a belligerent ship for conveyance on the ocean is universally recognized as the original rule of the law of nations. It is, as has already been stated, founded on the plain and simple principle that the property of a friend remains his property wherever it may be found. "Since it is not," says Vattel, "the place where a thing is which determines the nature of that thing, but the character of the person to whom it belongs; things belonging to neutral persons which happen to be in an enemy's country or on board an enemy's ships are to be distinguished from those which belong to the enemy."
> Bynkershoek lays down the same principles in terms equally explicit and in terms entitled to the more consideration, because he enters into the inquiry whether a knowledge of the hostile character of the vessel can affect the owner of the goods.
> The same principle is laid down by other writers on the same subject and is believed to be contradicted by none. It is true there were some old ordinances of France declaring that a hostile vessel or cargo should expose both to condemnation. But these ordinances have never constituted a rule of public law. It is deemed of much importance that the rule is universally laid down in terms which comprehend an armed as well as an unarmed vessel, and that armed vessels have never been excepted from it. Bynkershoek, in discussing a question suggesting an exception, with his mind directed to hostilities, does not hint that this privilege is confined to unarmed merchantmen.
> In point of fact, it is believed that a belligerent merchant vessel rarely sails unarmed, so that this exception from the rule would be greater than the rule itself. At all events, the number of those that are unarmed and who sail under convoy is too great not to have attracted the attention of writers on public law, and this exception to their broad general rule, if it existed, would certainly be found in some of their works. It would be strange if a rule laid down, with a view to war, in such broad terms as to have universal application, should be so construed as to exclude from its operation almost every case for which it purports to provide, and yet that not a dictum should be found in the books pointing to such construction.
> The antiquity of the rule is certainly not unworthy of consideration. It is to be traced back to the time when almost every merchantman was in a condition for self-defense, and the implements of war were so light and so cheap that scarcely any would sail without them.
> A belligerent has a perfect right to arm in his own defense, and a neutral has a perfect right to transport his goods in a belligerent vessel. These rights do not interfere with each other. The neutral has no control over the belligerent right to arm—ought he to be accountable for the exercise of it?
> By placing neutral property in a belligerent ship that property, according to the positive rule of law, does not cease to be neutral. Why should it be changed by the exercise of a belligerent right, universally acknowledged and in common use when the rule was laid down, and over which the neutral had no control?
> The belligerent answers that, by arming, his rights are impaired. By placing his goods under the guns of an enemy the neutral has taken part with the enemy and assumed the hostile character.
> Previous to that examination which the court has been able to make of the reasoning by which this proposition is sustained, one remark will be made which applies to a great part of it. The argument which, taken in its fair sense, would prove that it is unlawful to deposit goods for transportation in the vessels of an enemy generally, however imposing its form, must be unsound because it is in contradiction to acknowledged law.
> To the argument that by placing his goods in the vessel of an armed enemy he connects himself with that enemy and assumes the hostile character, it is answered that no such connection exists.
> The object of the neutral is the transportation of his goods. His connection with the vessel which transports them is the same whether that vessel be armed or unarmed. The act of arming is not his; it is the act of a party who has a right to do so. He meddles not with the armament nor with the war. Whether his goods were on board or not, the vessel would be armed and would sail. His goods do not contribute to the armament further than the freight he pays and freight he would pay were the vessel unarmed.

It is difficult to perceive in this argument anything which does not also apply to an unarmed vessel. In both instances it is the right and the duty of the carrier to avoid capture and to prevent a search. There is no difference except in the degree of capacity to carry this duty into effect. The argument would operate against the rule which permits the neutral merchant to employ a belligerent vessel without imparting to his goods the belligerent character.

The argument respecting resistance stands upon the same ground with that which respects arming. Both are lawful. Neither of them is chargeable to the goods or their owner where he has taken no part in it. They are incidents to the character of the vessel, and may always occur where the carrier is belligerent.

* * * * * * *

If the neutral character of the goods is forfeited by the resistance of the belligerent vessel, why is not the neutral character of the passengers forfeited by the same cause? The master and crew are prisoners of war; why are not those passengers who did not engage in the conflict also prisoners? That they are not would seem to the court to afford a strong argument in favor of the goods. The law would operate in the same manner on both.

It will be observed that the Chief Justice takes the passenger as exercising an absolutely unquestioned right, and that he is not subject to the law which makes the crew and the officers prisoners.

In the same case, Mr. Justice Johnson, who agreed in the decision but on somewhat different grounds, said:

The general rule, the incontestable principle, is that a neutral has a right to employ a belligerent carrier. He exposes himself thereby to capture and detention, but not to condemnation.

* * * * * * *

Every writer on international law acknowledges the right of the neutral to transport his goods in a hostile bottom. No writer has restricted the exercise of that right to unarmed ships.

* * * * * * *

And what is the decision of reason on the merits of these conflicting pretensions?

Her first and favorite answer would be that were the scales equally suspended between the parties the decision ought to be given in favor of humanity.

Already is the aspect of the world sufficiently darkened by the horrors of war. It is time to listen to the desponding claims of man engaged in the peaceful pursuits of life.

But there are considerations in favor of the neutral to which the heart need not assent; they are addressed to the judgment alone.

Admit the claim of the belligerent and you fritter away the right of the neutral until it is attenuated to a vision.

Admit the claim of the neutral and it is attended with a very immaterial change in the rights and interests of the belligerent.

Where are we to draw the line? If a vessel is not to be armed, what is to amount to an exceptional armament? It extends to an absolute and total privation of the right of arming a hostile ship. Resistance, and even capture, is lawful to any belligerent that is attacked.

On the other hand, what injury is done to the belligerent by recognizing the right of the neutral; the cargo of a belligerent neither adds nor diminishes his right to resist. If empty, he must be subdued before he can be possessed; and, if laden, the right or faculty of resistance is in no wise increased. It is inherent in her national character and can be exercised by strict right without any reference to the cargo that she contains. Suppose the case of a vessel and cargo wholly neutral; even she possesses a natural right to resist seizure, but her resistance must be effectual or international law pronounces her forfeited. What injury results to the belligerent cruiser? If the cargo be really neutral, the exercise of his right or judgment becomes immaterial; and if it be contraband, or otherwise subject to condemnation, what reason in nature can be assigned why the neutral owner should not throw himself upon the fortune of war and rely upon the protection of your enemy? You treat him as an enemy if captured, and why should not he regard you as an enemy and provide for his defense against you? I can very well conceive that a case may occur in which it may become the policy of this country to throw down the gauntlet to the world and assert a different principle. But the policy of these States is submitted to the wisdom of the legislature, and I shall feel myself bound by other reasons until the constitutional power shall decide what modification it will prescribe to the exercise of any acknowledged neutral right.

This decision was confirmed by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Atalanta (3 Wheaton, p. 400).

In these decisions it may be justly said, I think, that the court did not lay sufficient emphasis on the difference between a commissioned and an uncommissioned merchantman, but there can be no question as to the breadth and strength of the decisions as to the right of the neutral to place goods or take passage upon an armed belligerent merchantman, provided that the merchantman came within the rules affecting the armament of merchantmen. But little is said about passengers, because it had never then occurred to anyone that a passenger on a belligerent merchantman armed for defense was not there in the exercise of an undoubted right. The rule that the crew of a captured belligerent merchantman were to be treated as prisoners of war and neutral passengers were to be set free at the first opportunity, and that all alike were to be taken on board the captor and kept there in safety, was never questioned for a moment by any authority. If you will take the trouble to turn to Moore's International Law (Vol. VII, p. 490) and read the discussion on the subject of the destruction and sending in of prizes, you will see that the protection of the lives not only of the neutral passengers but of the crew of the captured ship is taken as a matter of course and that any other action looking to the destruction of the crew and passengers has always been regarded in the past as differing in no respect from murder and piracy. We may, therefore, take it as demonstrated by the decisions of the courts and the opinions of all the best writers on international law that a neutral has a clear right to take passage and ship goods on a belligerent merchantman, and that the merchantman being armed for self-defense does not impair this right in the slightest degree or take the merchantman out of the class or deprive it of the privileges of the unarmed trading vessel.

Now let us see what the attitude of our own Government has been in practice. In August, 1862, the British chargé d'affaires represented to our Government, on information received from naval officers, that a British steamer had been chased and fired on by a United States cruiser which had not displayed her colors, and had then been captured without search. This led Mr. Lincoln to direct that the following instructions be issued to our vessels of war:

Secondly. That while diligently exercising the right of visitation on all suspected vessels, you are in no case authorized to chase and fire at a foreign vessel without showing your colors and giving her the customary preliminary notice of a desire to speak and visit her.

Mr. Lincoln made it evident by these instructions that he was utterly opposed to having a ship of the United States creep up under false colors, or in any disguise, upon a merchantman and capture or destroy her without visit and search. I think we may say with certainty that that great President would never have assented to having a United States submarine creep up on a merchantman under water and destroy her, with all on board, including neutral and noncombatant men, women, and children, without giving them any opportunity to escape. The difference in the instrument of destruction makes no difference in the principle laid down by Lincoln in the instructions I have just quoted.

In the next war in which the United States was engaged, the War with Spain, President McKinley issued the following instructions (General Orders, No. 492, June 20, 1898; Foreign Relations, 1898, 781):

This right should be exercised with tact and consideration and in strict conformity with treaty provisions wherever they exist. The following directions are given, subject to any special treaty stipulations: After firing a blank charge and causing the vessel to lie to, the cruiser shall send a small boat, no larger than a whaleboat, with an officer to conduct the search. There may be arms in the boat, but the men should not wear them on their persons. The officer, wearing his side arms and accompanied on board by not more than two of his boat crew, unarmed, should first examine the vessel's papers to ascertain her nationality and her ports of departure and destination. If she is neutral and trading between neutral ports, the examination goes no further. If she is neutral and bound to an enemy's port not blockaded, the papers which indicate the character of her cargo should be examined. If these show contraband of war, the vessel should be seized; if not, she should be set free, unless, by reason of strong grounds of suspicion, a further search should seem to be requisite.

Contrast these instructions of Lincoln and McKinley, with their humanity, morality, and respect for law with what was actually done in the cases of the Lusitania, the Arabic, and the Ancona.

We now come to the position taken by our Government in the present war. At the very beginning, on the 19th of September, 1914, Mr. Lansing sent to all the representatives of foreign powers the following circular, defining the status of armed merchant vessels:

(A) A merchant vessel of belligerent nationality may carry an armament and ammunition for the sole purpose of defense without acquiring the character of a ship of war.

(B) The presence of an armament and ammunition on board a merchant vessel creates the presumption that the armament is for offensive purposes, but the owners or agents may overcome this presumption by evidence showing that the vessel carries armament solely for defense.

(C) Evidence necessary to establish the fact that the armament is solely for defense and will not be used offensively, whether the armament be mounted or stowed below, must be presented in each case independently at an official investigation. The result of the investigation must show conclusively that the armament is not intended for and will not be used in offensive operations.

Indications that the armament will not be used offensively are:

1. That the caliber of the guns carried does not exceed 6 inches—

That is a pretty formidable gun—

2. That the guns and small arms carried are few in number.
3. That no guns are mounted on the forward part of the vessel.
4. That the quantity of ammunition carried is small.
5. That the vessel is manned by its usual crew and the officers are the same as those on board before war was declared.
6. That the vessel intends to and actually does clear for a port lying in its usual trade route or a port indicating its purpose to continue in the same trade in which it was engaged before war was declared.
7. That the vessel takes on board fuel and supplies sufficient only to carry it to its port of destination or the same quantity substantially which it has been accustomed to take for a voyage before war was declared.

8. That the cargo of the vessel consists of articles of commerce unsuited for the use of a ship of war in operations against an enemy.

9. That the vessel carries passengers who are as a whole unfitted to enter the military or naval service of the belligerent whose flag the vessel flies, or of any of its allies, and particularly if the passenger list includes women and children.

10. That the speed of the ship is slow.

(D) Port authorities, on the arrival in a port of the United States of an armed vessel of belligerent nationality claiming to be a merchant vessel, should immediately investigate and report to Washington on the foregoing indications as to the intended use of the armament, in order that it may be determined whether the evidence is sufficient to remove the presumption that the vessel is and should be treated as a ship of war. Clearance will not be granted until authorized from Washington, and the master will be so informed upon arrival.

(E) The conversion of a merchant vessel into a ship of war is a question of fact which is to be established by direct or circumstantial evidence of intention to use the vessel as a ship of war.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator give the date of those instructions?

Mr. LODGE. The 19th of September, 1914.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator stated that it was Mr. Lansing?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Lansing. He was Acting Secretary of State at that time and signed the circular.

Nothing could have been more explicit. This circular in all its terms follows exactly the practice of nations for many centuries, adopts the rules which had been evolved in regard to the treatment of armed merchantmen and their status and adheres to the policy pursued by our own Government not only as exhibited in the decisions of our courts but in the instructions to our officers in time of war. This circular shows that in the opinion of our Government a merchantman does not lose its character by carrying defensive armament, that the only question is one of fact as to the amount of that armament, the usages to which it is put, and the general character of the ship; that if the armed merchantman conforms to the limitations embodied in law and expressed in the circular, she does not lose her status as a merchantman, and the fact that she is armed for self-defense does not impair in the slightest degree the right of the neutral to ship goods or take passage on such a ship.

A little later, on the 7th of November, 1914, Mr. Lansing sent the following note to Mr. Gerard, our ambassador at Berlin:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 7, 1914.

Your 515, October 15. The Government of the United States is obliged to dissent from the views of the German Government as expressed in your telegram in regard to the treatment to be accorded armed merchant vessels of belligerent nationalities in neutral ports. The practice of a majority of nations and the consensus of opinion by the leading authorities on international law, including many German writers, support the proposition that merchant vessels may arm for defense without losing their private character and that they may employ such armament against hostile attack without contravening the principles of international law.

The purpose of an armament on a merchant vessel is to be determined by various circumstances, among which are the number and position of the guns on the vessel, the quantity of ammunition and fuel, the number and sex of the passengers, the nature of the cargo, etc. Tested by evidence of this character the question as to whether an armament on a merchant vessel is intended solely for defensive purposes may be readily answered, and the neutral Government should regulate its treatment of the vessel in accordance with the intended use of the armament.

This Government considers that in permitting a private vessel having a general cargo, a customary amount of fuel, an average crew, and passengers of both sexes on board, and carrying a small armament and a small amount of ammunition to enjoy the hospitality of an American port as a merchant vessel, it is in no way violating its duty as a neutral. Nevertheless it is not unmindful of the fact that the circumstances of a particular case may be such as to cause embarrassment and possible controversy as to the character of an armed private vessel visiting its ports. Recognizing, therefore, the desirability of avoiding a ground of complaint, this Government, as soon as a case arose, while frankly admitting the right of a merchant vessel to carry a defensive armament, expressed its disapprobation of a practice which compelled it to pass upon a vessel's intended use, which opinion if proven subsequently to be erroneous might constitute a ground for a charge of unneutral conduct.

As a result of these representations no merchant vessels with armaments have visited the ports of the United States since the 10th of September. In fact, from the beginning of the European war but two armed private vessels have entered or cleared from ports of this country, and as to these vessels their character as merchant vessels was conclusively established.

Please bring the foregoing to the attention of the German Government, and in doing so express the hope that they will also prevent their merchant vessels from entering the ports of the United States carrying armaments, even for defensive purposes, though they may possess the right to do so by the rules of international law.

It will be seen by this note that although Mr. Lansing expresses the hope that merchantmen may not be armed because armament gives rise to many questions of fact, he admits in the fullest way the right of the merchantman to arm for self-defense without losing her character, and the right of the neutral to take passage or ship goods on the merchantman remains unimpaired by the fact that the merchantman possesses a defensive armament.

Again, in the President's note of May 13, 1915, after the Lusitania disaster, which was signed by Mr. Bryan, it is said:

American citizens act within their indisputable rights in taking their ships and in traveling wherever their legitimate business calls them upon the high seas and exercise those rights in what should be the well-justified confidence that their lives will not be endangered by acts done in clear violation of universally acknowledged international obligations, and certainly in the confidence that their own Government will sustain them in the exercise of their rights.

That was no longer ago than May, 1915.

Such, in outline, has been the practice of all nations in regard to the armed merchantman. Such has been the position of our own Government down to less than a year ago. It seems utterly incredible that this position should be in any way altered now or that our Government should be ready to surrender the unquestioned rights of Americans to travel or ship goods on a belligerent merchantman subject to all the rules which have been established by the courts and by all international authorities for at least two centuries. The just rights of the citizens of any nation can not be maintained by their surrender.

The abandonment of those rights by any neutral Government on the ground that the invention of submarines with the necessary limitations upon the powers of capture possessed by those boats is inconceivable. Such abandonment could only rest on the ground that the rights of neutrals, the rules which for centuries have been agreed upon by all nations for the protection of innocent lives upon vessels captured in war, must be thrown aside and discarded in order that a new instrument of maritime destruction shall not be impeded in its work of death and murder. Such a doctrine is revolting to every instinct of humanity, to every principle of law and justice.

There is, however, another side to this matter which is of even graver importance. There can be no question that any act by a neutral which alters conditions created by the war is an unneutral act and places the neutral upon the side of one belligerent or the other.

This is eminently true of any form of embargo, and there is no need that I should repeat the unanswerable argument on this point embodied by Mr. Lansing in his note of last August to the Government of Austria-Hungary. The war, and the war alone, has also created conditions under which any change at this time in the attitude which we took officially at the outset of the war in regard to armed merchantmen would be an unneutral act. The merchantmen of one belligerent have been swept from the seas. Therefore if we should abandon all the principles on this subject that we have ever sustained, if we should abandon the rules laid down by Mr. Lansing in his circular of September, 1914, and declare that our ports were closed to armed merchantmen, or that goods and passengers from the United States could not be placed on an uncommissioned merchantman, armed solely for self-defense, our action would affect only one belligerent; it would alter conditions created by the war, and would therefore be unneutral. It would make us at once the ally of the belligerent whose merchant marine has been driven from the ocean. It would put us in a position of hostility to those belligerents whose merchant marine still freely sail the seas. It would make us the ally of one belligerent and expose us to the just hostility of the others. It would be a step toward war. For these reasons I can not believe that the reports which have been published in the press can possibly be true, and I hope the somewhat confused contradictions are well founded. I can not believe that the administration thinks for a moment of altering, weakening, or impairing the well-defined position which it took at the outset of the European war, and I believe that it must stand as firmly on this question as it has on the question of the embargo. Should it act otherwise it would accept a humiliation and incur a danger of war from which even the boldest and the most unscrupulous would shrink, and therefore such a course as has been discussed in the newspapers seems to me wholly inconceivable.

I ask leave, Mr. President, to print a memorandum of authorities relating to this question at the conclusion of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

AUTHORITIES AND OPINIONS AS TO THE STATUS OF ARMED MERCHANTMEN.

The conversion of a merchant vessel into a ship of war is a question of fact which is to be established by direct or circumstantial evidence of intention to use the vessel as a ship of war. (The American Journal of International Law. Supplement, January, 1915. Official documents, pp. 121, 122.)

"In answer to your request for an expression of opinion in regard to Mr. Ogden's question whether a vessel which he is said to be fitting out for a trading voyage to the South Sea Islands can carry two guns and other arms for protection and defense against the natives, I am not aware of any international prohibition or of any treaty provision which would prevent a vessel trading amid the groups of islands of the South Sea from carrying a couple of guns and arms for the proper and necessary protection of the vessel against violence on the part of lawless or partially civilized communities, or of the piratical crews which are represented to occasionally frequent those waters, providing always that the vessel carrying such guns and arms itself be on a lawful voyage and be engaged in none other than peaceful commerce, and that such guns and arms be intended and be used solely for the purpose of defense and of self-protection." (Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, to Mr. Morrill, Feb. 8, 1877; 117 Dom. Let., 54.)

"A copy of your No. 23, of the 10th instant, in regard to the case of the American schooner Water Witch, which arrived in Haitian waters with two cannon and 60 pounds of powder on board, having been transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, that official has replied to your inquiry whether sailing vessels of the United States are allowed to carry any armament as ship's stores or otherwise that the laws do not forbid the carrying of articles of the character mentioned, provided there shall be no violation of chapter 67 of the Revised Statutes." (Mr. Gresham, Secretary of State, to Mr. Smythe, minister to Haiti, Jan. 31, 1894. For. Rel., 1894, 337; MS. Inst. Haiti, III, 375.)

Chapter 67, Revised Statutes, embracing sections 5281 to 5291, relates to neutrality. Section 5289 reads as follows:

"SEC. 5289. The owners or consignees of every armed vessel sailing out of the ports of the United States, belonging wholly or in part to citizens thereof, shall, before clearing out the same, give bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties in double the amount of the value of the vessel and cargo on board, including her armament, conditioned that the vessel shall not be employed by such owners to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace."

"It should also be borne in mind that a merchant vessel using arms for acts of destruction on the high seas, unless duly commissioned for the purpose, may expose herself to a charge of piracy.

"The law does not prohibit armed vessels belonging to citizens of the United States from sailing out of our ports; it only requires the owners to give security that such vessels shall not be employed by them to commit hostilities against foreign powers at peace with the United States." (United States v. Quincy, 6 Pet., 445.)

The seizure by France of an American merchantman and her condemnation can not be justified by the fact that she was armed for defensive purposes (Cushing v. United States, 22 Ct. Cl., 1; Hooper v. United States, 22 Ct. Cl., 408; Moore, J. B., A digest of international law, vol. 2, pp. 1070, 1071.)

Noncommissioned vessels have a right to resist when summoned to surrender to public ships or privateers of the enemy. The crews therefore which make such resistence have belligerent privileges; and it is a natural consequence of the legitimateness of their acts that if they succeed in capturing their assailant the capture is a good one for the purpose of changing the ownership of the property taken and of making the enemy prisoners of war. (Harg. Law T., 245, 246, 247; W. E. Hall, International Law, 6th ed., pp. 524–525; London, 1909.)

Sir Matthew Hale held it to be depredation in a subject to attack the enemy's vessels, except in his own defense, without a commission. (Harg. Law T., 245, 246, 247.) The subject has been repeatedly discussed in the Supreme Court of the United States (Brown v. United States, 8 Cranch, 132–135; the Nereide, 9 Cranch, 449; the Dos Hermanos, 2 Wheat., 76, and 10 Wheat., 306; the Amiable Isabella, 6 Wheat., 1), and the doctrine of international law is considered to be that private citizens can not acquire a title to hostile property unless seized under a commission, but they may still lawfully seize hostile property in their own defense. (Kent's Commentary on International Law, edited by J. T. Abdy, 2d ed.; 1878; pp. 225, 226.)

To enable a vessel to make captures which shall enure to the benefit of the captors it is necessary that she should have a commission of prize. But noncommissioned vessels of a belligerent nation may not only make captures in their own defense, but may, at all times, capture hostile ships and cargoes without being deemed by the law of nations to be pirates; though they can have no interest in prizes so captured. (2 Brown's Civ. and Adm. Law, 524; Caseregis, Disc., 24, No. 24; 2 Woodes, Lect., 432; Consolato del Mare, ch. 287, 288; 3 Buls., 27; 4 Inst., 152, 154; Zouch. Adm. Jurisd., ch. 4, 101; Com. Dig. Admiralty, E. 3; the Georgiana, 1 Dodson, 397; the Diligentia, Id., 403; the Emulous, 8 Cranch, 131; the Nereide, 9 Cranch, 449; the Dos Hermanos, ante, 76; 2 Wheat. [U. S.] Appendix, p. 7.)

CONVENTION (VII) RELATING TO THE CONVERSION OF MERCHANT SHIPS INTO WARSHIPS.

(Signed at The Hague, October 18, 1907.)

His Majesty the German Emperor, King of Prussia, etc.:

Whereas it is desirable, in view of the incorporation in time of war of merchant ships in the fighting fleet, to define the conditions subject to which this operation may be effected;

Whereas, however, the contracting powers have been unable to come to an agreement on the question whether the conversion of a merchant ship into a warship may take place upon the high seas, it is understood that the question of the place where such conversion is effected remains outside the scope of this agreement and is in no way affected by the following rules;

Being desirous of concluding a convention to this effect, have appointed the following as their plenipotentiaries:

(Here follow the names of plenipotentiaries.)

Who, after having deposited their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following provisions:

ARTICLE 1. A merchant ship converted into a warship can not have the rights and duties accruing to such vessels unless it is placed under the direct authority, immediate control, and responsibility of the power whose flag it flies.

ART. 2. Merchant ships converted into warships must bear the external marks which distinguish the warships of their nationality.

ART. 3. The commander must be in the service of the State and duly commissioned by the competent authorities. His name must figure on the list of the officers of the fighting fleet.

ART. 4. The crew must be subject to military discipline.

ART. 5. Every merchant ship converted into a warship must observe in its operations the laws and customs of war.

ART. 6. A belligerent who converts a merchant ship into a warship must, as soon as possible, announce such conversion in the list of warships.

ART. 7. The provisions of the present convention do not apply except between contracting powers, and then only if all the belligerents are parties to the convention.

[Extract from the procès-verbal.]

The Imperial Ottoman Government does not engage to recognize as vessels of war ships which, being in its waters or on the high seas under a merchant flag, are converted on the opening of hostilities. (Actes et documents, vol. i, p. 277.)

Great Britain: A warship is every vessel which sails under a recognized flag and which has been armed at the expense of the State for use against the enemy, and whose officers and crew have been commissioned by their competent authorities for that purpose. A vessel may receive this character only before sailing from a national port and may give it up only after the return into a national port. Auxiliary cruiser is every enemy or neutral merchant ship which is used for transportation of marines, munitions of war, fuel, foodstuffs, water, or other ammunitions of war for a fleet, or which is commissioned to make repairs, to deliver dispatches, for reconnoitering, in so far as it must follow the sailing directions directly or indirectly given by the navy. This definition covers also every vessel which is used for transportation of troops.

Germany: The necessary characteristics of warships are: The naval ensign (as a rule, the pennant), a Government-appointed commander whose name is entered on the service list of the navy, and a crew under military discipline (see secs. 2–4 and 6 of Agreement VII of the second Hague conference). (From chap. 1, sec. 2, of German Prize Law of Sept. 30, 1909, promulgated Aug. 3, 1914.)

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am in entire accord with the position taken by both Senators who have addressed the Senate this morning on the subject of Senate resolution 100. The very illuminating remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] being based, however, to some extent upon newspaper publications, outlining or assuming to outline the attitude of the administration upon this very important subject, and which are concededly unofficial, I think it is not inappropriate at this time to call attention to the latest announcement of the newspapers concerning the subject.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator will allow me a moment. The Senator has been kind enough to listen to me, and he must have noticed that I twice said these reports had been contradicted, and that I hoped the contradictions were well founded.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; the Senator said that on two occasions, and I join with him in expressing the hope, and I add to it the belief, that the reports are not well founded. It may be that this morning's publication relating to the matter may also be unfounded. It certainly is not official.

Upon the assumption that these reports, conflicting as they are, may be equally credible, and perhaps invoking the presumption that that which is in conformity with the established rules of international law is the more credible, I take the liberty of reading into the RECORD the statement of the Washington Post of this date regarding the matter, eliminating, of course, the headlines:

The United States in its submarine controversy with Germany will accept nothing short of a full and complete agreement covering all the points for which it has contended as to assurances that the warfare in the future will be conducted in accordance with the established principles of international law.

In announcing that fact yesterday, Secretary Lansing let it be known that the State Department considers Germany's declaration of its intention to sink, without warning after February 29, all armed merchant ships of the entente allies to be inconsistent with the assurances previously given this Government by the Berlin foreign office.

The tentative communication designed to end the Lusitania case, still in the possession of Secretary Lansing, will not be formally accepted until such assurances regarding the future are given, although the communication, in so far as it relates to the Lusitania itself, is acceptable.

AUSTRIAN NOTICE ALSO VIOLATION.

State Department officials also consider that the Austro-Hungarian memorandum regarding armed ships is not in accord with the assurances given by that Government in the negotiations over the sinking of the Italian steamship Ancona. Consequently, final settlement of the Ancona case, once postponed because of the doubt regarding the circumstances of the sinking of the British steamship Persia, probably will be withheld until Austria gives similar assurances to those now requested from Germany.

The views of the United States were explained in detail yesterday by Secretary Lansing to Count von Bernstorff, the German ambassador. The ambassador was informed, it was indicated at the State Department, that the United States desires the German declaration regarding armed merchant ships to be modified.

VON BERNSTORFF CABLES BERLIN.

Later in the day the ambassador sent a long dispatch to his government, explaining the position and requirements of the United States. It was understood that the ambassador informed his government that the United States wanted particularly to know whether the assurances previously given in the Lusitania and the Arabic cases still were in force.

Last night it was stated emphatically in Teutonic diplomatic circles that the Berlin foreign office would not modify the declaration of intention to sink armed ships or inform the United States the previous assurances still were binding unless Great Britain should give assurances of some kind that a submarine which warns a British steamship, armed ostensibly for defensive purposes, would not be fired upon.

In this connection it was explained at the State Department that the United States considers unarmed merchant ships and ships armed for defensive purposes to be in identically the same class. Furthermore, it is held that the word "liners," as employed in the previous assurances from Germany regarding the conduct of submarine warfare, includes freight as well as passenger ships.

GERMAN POSITION NOT ENCOURAGED.

It was declared at the department that at no time had suggestions been made to the German Government which would have led it to issue its latest memorandum. This answered statements by German officials that the American memorandum to the entente allies, suggesting a modus vivendi for the disarming of merchant ships, was the direct cause of Germany issuing her declaration. From other sources outside the department came the information that the department had been advised informally of the German intentions in this respect.

The remainder of the article, Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD without the necessity of detaining the Senate by reading it.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The State Department is carefully viewing from various angles the assurances given in the early days of the war by Great Britain to the effect that the guns on her merchant ships would be used only for defensive purposes. It was admitted that the department has in its possession information charging that since the assurances were given certain British merchantmen have used their armament for offensive attacks on German submarines. The information came through German sources and is not regarded as being conclusive evidence.

Officials are now awaiting the receipt of what Germany alleges to be a copy of secret instructions given by the British Government to the commanders of merchant ships. This document and others appended to the text of the German declaration have been mailed from Berlin.

Officials yesterday declined to say exactly what the State Department would regard as defensive armament. This question will enter into future negotiations regarding the conduct of submarine warfare. In response to an inquiry one of the ways in which a merchant ship might use armament for defensive purposes was explained at the State Department, in answer to the oft-repeated assertion from Teutonic quarters that under prevailing conditions a merchant ship could not use any armament except for offensive purposes.

It was suggested that if a merchant ship, in response to a warning shot from a submarine flees, is bombarded during flight, later comes to a stop, and the bombardment is not immediately stopped, she is justified in defending herself.

AUSTRIAN NOTE MADE PUBLIC.

The Austrian notice of intention to treat armed belligerent merchant ships as subject to attack without warning was made public yesterday by the State Department from Ambassador Penfield in Vienna. It is dated February 10 and is in line with the German declaration on the same subject already published.

Ambassador Penfield transmitted the Austrian memorandum, which appeared in the Vienna papers on the day he sent his dispatch. It is substantially the same as that transmitted to this country from Vienna via London on February 10 and 11. He transmitted it by request of the Austrian foreign office.

The only difference which attracts attention is that the first version says the Austrial naval forces will treat armed ships as "warships," and that received yesterday says "belligerent vessels."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Can the Senator from Colorado tell us whether the account which he has just read from the newspaper is an accurate statement of the position of the State Department?

Mr. THOMAS. Perhaps the Senator did not hear my statement. I said at the outset I did not know whether it was authentic or not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it is absolutely impossible to hear the Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. THOMAS. I said at the outset of my remarks that I did not know whether the article is authentic or not, but inasmuch as none of these newspaper articles are authentic, and they are concededly unofficial, I also stated that the last declaration of the press upon the subject, especially as it is in conformity with the established principles of international law regarding the subject, was presumably quite as authentic, if not more so, than those which announce the contrary doctrine.

Mr. STONE obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to take about a minute to put in the RECORD, in connection with the remarks of the Senators who have just spoken——

Mr. STONE. Are they newspaper articles?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. STONE. I object.

Mr. JONES. Then I will simply say that these articles will be read into the RECORD when the time comes, because they have a bearing on this matter.

Mr. STONE. That is all right.

Mr. President, before making the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, I desire to say just a word respecting the matter discussed this morning.

The practice of arming merchant vessels for defensive purposes is an old one, long universally recognized. The practice grew up out of two things, one being the custom of nations commissioning privately owned vessels, known as privateers, to go forth in time of war to attack and capture the commercial ships of a belligerent, the captured ships being appropriated in whole or in part by the captor. Of course this authority empowered the privateer to destroy as well as to capture.

Another reason upon which the right to arm merchant vessels for purely defensive purposes was founded was the danger to which such vessels were subject in certain quarters of the world from pirates. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and earlier and even later, piracy was a real danger in many parts of the world. By universal consent ships of commerce were permitted to bear arms to defend themselves against attacks from that source. But the leading maritime nations in later years have waged such merciless warfare on pirates and piratical peoples that the menace of piracy has substantially disappeared. Moreover, by the declaration of Paris of April 16, 1856, privateering was abolished and is no longer permissible.

It is upon the authority of the practices I have referred to that it is now claimed that the merchant vessels of a belligerent during a war between maritime nations may lawfully bear arms for the purpose of resisting attacks made upon them by the vessels of an enemy. I can not but believe that in the circumstances of the present time this is, to say the least, a very debatable question, and I feel that those of us who are interested in the attitude of this Republic should debate this subject, as we should debate all other subjects, in a broad way, not in a partisan way, with a view to determining what should be the wise and just policy of this Government, which policy should comport with both the letter and spirit of international law, and should be established with a view to the maintenance of a genuine and impartial neutrality between the nations at war.

But, Mr. President, as I am anxious to proceed with other business to-day, in accordance with the notice given on yesterday, I will not now enter upon any discussion of the questions covered by the speeches delivered this morning or upon any other question in anywise related thereto. I desire some time next week to submit some observations to the Senate touching our relations to the European belligerent powers and also to make some criticism of the recent speech delivered by former Senator Root respecting the foreign policies of the present administration.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Just a moment. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document certain selections marked in the books I have before me. The first is an extract from Moore's International Law Digest, volume 7, beginning under the title "Declaration of Paris," on page 561, and embracing all the pages from there down to and including page 583.

I also ask unanimous consent that there be printed an article written by Mr. A. Pearce Higgins, of Lincoln's Inn, barrister at law, lecturer on international law at various schools and universities, author of the book entitled "The Hague Peace Treaties and other International Conferences Concerning the Laws and Usages of War," and so forth.

Of course, Mr. President, if this print should be made for the convenience of Senators, it would not by any means embody all the law applicable to the questions raised in the deliverances of this morning, but I think it would be of great value to Senators who might care to look into the subject in a convenient form. I ask unanimous consent that the excerpts to which I have referred, one being from Moore's International Law Digest and the other the article of Mr. Higgins in the American Journal of International Law, volume 8, beginning at page 705, be printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 332.)

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I shall not extend the same courtesy to the Senator from Missouri that he has extended to me. Therefore I shall not object to his request.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], but nevertheless I have given notice heretofore, as has the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] likewise given notice time and again, that I would object, as the Senator from Utah has said he would object, to constantly inserting in the RECORD mere newspaper articles upon current questions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the request of the Senator from Missouri is granted.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Missouri withhold that motion for just a few minutes?

Mr. STONE. I withhold the motion.

Mr. TILLMAN. I send to the desk a resolution, which I wish to have read, and then I desire to make a few remarks upon it. I shall be very brief.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five hours and a half spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 18, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou infinite Source of Life and Light, through whose boundless love we live and move and have our being, strengthen, we beseech Thee, our arm of faith, brighten our star of hope, and inspire us with high and holy aspirations that we may move forward as individuals to larger life and as a people to higher attainments; that our Republic may be the star of hope to the liberty-loving people of all the world; that right may make for might, liberty for truth and righteousness; that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in all the earth. In the spirit of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 1424. An act incorporating the American Academy of Arts and Letters.

LABOR'S NATIONAL PEACE COUNCIL.

The SPEAKER. Under a special order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I first desire to have read by the Clerk a part of an article from the Chicago Tribune of December 29, 1915, under the head of "Labor council chiefs indicted as war plotters. BUCHANAN and Fowler are among those accused by Federal jury in New York." To save time I want that part read under the head of "Witnesses tell stories."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WITNESSES TELL STORIES.

From two Government witnesses the Tribune has obtained a story of charges made against Congressman FRANK BUCHANAN and seven other men who were indicted as pro-German plotters by the New York grand jury.

One of the men from whom the story comes is Charles H. Canode, president of the Bronson-Canode Printing Co., of South State Street. Mr. Canode was a vice president of the Labor Peace Council, and presided at the first meeting after its organization in the offices of John Fitzpatrick and E. N. Nockels, president and secretary of the Chicago Federation of Labor.

Another is William F. Kramer, also a vice president of the peace council and international secretary of the Brotherhood of Blacksmiths.

FACTS GIVEN BY CANODE.

This is the story told by Mr. Canode:

"Congressman BUCHANAN and ex-Congressman Robert Fowler and H. B. Martin were the principal promoters of the organization of the Labor Peace Council. They were to furnish the money or intimated they would do so.

"We were led to believe that the purpose of the organization was to promote peace in Europe and the United States. We were to advocate industrial rest and bring pressure to bear to prevent the manufacture of munitions to be shipped to Europe. Our constitution was similar to the one upon which the American Federation of Labor is founded.

"My firm was given a contract to publish propaganda for the peace council. Congressman BUCHANAN gave me $1,000 as a deposit to pay for some of the work. He was to get the rest from Martin. The peace council continued to hold meetings. One day at the Federation of Labor offices some one presented a resolution condemning President Wilson. E. N. Nockels got up and objected to its passage, and said it was against the principles laid down in the constitution.

"Following that other things began to look queer, and Mr. Nockels and Mr. Fitzpatrick conferred with Samuel Gompers, who had an inkling that all was not right with the promoters of the peace council. They withdrew their support. A month later Mr. Kramer and I felt that there was a 'nigger in the woodpile' and we began to look around to see who was going to fulfill various obligations that had been incurred.

"I went to BUCHANAN. He said he would make Martin pay the debts which had been incurred. I understand that Martin had at his disposal somewhat near $200,000. I expressed doubt that Martin would make good. Then BUCHANAN said to me, in substance:

"'Of course he will, and if he don't and wants to spill the beans then I will tell a few things.'

"A few days later Martin left, and I haven't seen him since. I told this to the grand jury. I told them all I knew, because I feel it my duty to go to the front on a thing like this. Had I any suspicion that all was not right, I would have revealed it at the start.

"I have since learned that Franz von Rintelen came to this country with the money to be spent in fostering strikes and financing various plots and schemes. His right-hand man was David Lamar.

HOW MUCH MONEY NEEDED?

"A man named Ike J. Cundiff, a machinist, was hired to organize strikes. Cundiff, as far as I know, is honest. He was instructed one time to go to Ilion, N. Y., and help out in a threatened strike. He found the trouble all settled. He had been instructed to sign all communications with the letter 'K.'

"He sent back the following message in substance:

"'Strike here is settled. My presence is unnecessary. Await your orders.'

"Cundiff is alleged to have received back the following message:

"'Stay on the job. How much money will it take? Wire me the amount.'

"Well, Cundiff was not going to be a party to mulcting anyone, and he replied that no money was necessary, as the strike was settled.

"I believe there was in numerous cases such an element—a trick to mulct the German agents themselves.

HOPE BUCHANAN IS CLEAR.

"How far the indicted men were involved in these deals is for the trial jury to decide. I had hopes that Congressman BUCHANAN was innocent. In fact, I still would be pleased to learn he had proved himself so. I liked Frank, but I can not understand why he did not reveal any information he might have had.

"When I was shown the minute book and other documents of the Labor Peace Council while in New York I was amazed to see that some one had torn out the original minutes in the handwriting of L. P. Straube, of Chicago, and had substituted other pages. The substituted pages told of the passing of a resolution which was an utterance of rank treason and would have been a disgrace for any American citizen to condone. I was present every minute of the meeting at Washington and was positive no such resolutions had been passed. I could see that the substitution had been made by some one interested in showing the German agents that the Labor Peace Council was advocating sabotage and villifying the principles of the American Government.

"Upon closer examination I saw that the resolution had been written on paper bearing the letterhead of the Labor Peace Council. The official letterheads of the peace council were printed by my own firm, but this resolution was written on an imitation letterhead and had been printed by a firm in Washington, as I discovered from the watermark. Also it did not bear the union label."

PUTS BLAME ON OTHERS.

William F. Kramer, one of the vice presidents of the Labor Peace Council, had the following to say:

"The gang went about the work and got away with it by pretending to be agents of the Labor Peace Council. The Labor Peace Council knew nothing about their acts, and had any of those fellows applied for membership it would have been denied.

"They sent telegrams signed 'K,' which asked for money. I was amazed at their cunning in seeking to mulct each other by using initials which would give the impression that I and my associates were lending our efforts to further their schemes.

"Congressman BUCHANAN was the first to promote the Labor Peace Council. I would be much pleased to know that he is innocent. If those indicted men are guilty, then they deserve all that the law can give them."

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, knowing favorably the men that are quoted there, I did not believe that they could be induced by bribery or otherwise to make false statements that would reflect upon me. I therefore wrote to two of my friends in Chicago, stating to them that I did not believe it was possible for these men to have made these false statements, but to go to them and inquire whether or not the statements accredited to them in the Chicago Tribune were correct. They did me this favor, and I desire to have the Clerk read a letter addressed to my friend George Fitzgerald in regard to the statement which has been read in the Chicago Tribune.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHICAGO, January 7, 1916.

Mr. GEORGE FITZGERALD,
808 West Van Buren Street, Chicago.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of January 6, relative to the interview in the Chicago Tribune recently, and in which article the reporter is purported to have quoted me. I wish to say the supposed interview is absolutely without foundation of fact. The article states that Mr. BUCHANAN said he would "spill the beans if Martin failed to pay my bill," which is absolutely false.

The article further states that I. J. Cundiff was hired to organize strikes, whereas I specifically stated that Mr. Cundiff was hired for the purpose of organizing local councils for Labor's National Peace Council.

Furthermore it states that this supposed interview was practically what I testified to before the grand jury while in New York, while as a matter of fact I could not have made that statement for the reason that I did not testify before the grand jury in New York.

A day or two after the article appeared the reporter responsible for it called up my office in my absence and asked my stenographer if I had made any comment on the article, and on my stenographer answering that she did not know, and that he would have to talk to me about it, he then said he just wanted to know whether I had done any swearing after having read the article.

The comment which wound up this interview relative to Mr. BUCHANAN is all false. I never stated that to the reporter or anyone else, and do not know why this statement should have been credited to me.

I called Mr. Kendall, the Tribune reporter, over the phone to-day and he said that statement about "spilling the beans" was all a mistake and that the other statements attributed to me were mistakes in the make-up of the paper, and no opportunity was given him to correct it. This last statement from Mr. Kendall may be taken for what it is worth, but I want it understood that there is absolutely no basis for them attributing those statements to me.

On the other hand, if the persons responsible for the bills incurred by Labor's National Peace Council had kept their word and paid their bills there would have been no occasion for anyone drawing me into this controversy.

Yours, very truly, CHAS. H. CANODE.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I might say by way of explanation that the trouble in collecting the bills was after I had resigned from the Labor Peace Conference. I ask that the Clerk read a letter written by Mr. Kramer denying that statement.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF BLACKSMITHS AND HELPERS,
Chicago, January 7, 1916.

Mr. JOHN J. WALT,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: The attached clipping, which appeared in the Chicago Tribune of December 29, 1915, is an interview credited as coming from me, and I desire to say that the article is a malicious falsehood and deny most emphatically having made such statements to any person.

Yours, fraternally, WM. F. KRAMER.

[From the Chicago Tribune, Dec. 29, 1915.]

William F. Kramer, one of the vice presidents of Labor Peace Council, had the following to say:

"The gang went about the work and got away with it by pretending to be agents of the Labor Peace Council. The Labor Peace Council knew nothing about their acts, and had any of these fellows applied for membership it would have been denied.

"They sent telegrams signed 'K.' which asked for money. I was amazed at their cunning in seeking to mulct each other by using initials which would have the impression that I and my associates were lending our efforts to further their schemes.

"Congressman BUCHANAN was the first to promote the Labor Peace Council. I would be pleased to know that he is innocent. If those indicted men are guilty, then they deserve all that the law can give them."

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the article in the Chicago Tribune is one of a great many of the erroneous and libelous statements in the newspapers of the country. Among others, there was a newspaper report stating that Mr. Straube, secretary of the Labor National Peace Council, during the time I was connected with it, and who remained secretary after I had disconnected myself from it—the statement was made that he was going to disclose some of the secrets of the Labor National Peace Council by giving the grand jury the books and papers, and so forth. I told my friends that was all right, that there was nothing done during my time but what we were willing to have the closest scrutiny of and, if necessary, to have it published in the papers. We never had any secret meetings and never did anything that we were trying to hide from the public. But in response to an inquiry by my friends as to the Tribune's statement reflecting on me, I desire to have the Clerk read a letter from Mr. Straube.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMERCIAL PORTRAIT ARTISTS' UNION,
19 West Adams Street, Chicago, January 7, 1916.

Hon. FRANK BUCHANAN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR BUCHANAN: In response to inquiries made by John J. Walt and George Fitzgerald relative to the authenticity of alleged newspaper interviews with me dealing with Labor's National Peace Council affairs, permit me to say in the most emphatic manner possible that the only statement I ever personally gave to the press was to the effect that the explanatory pamphlet issued by the council bearing our respective signatures constituted all there was to be said on the subject, except that our subsequent actions were such that not one of the Chicago representatives of the council need fear the most rigid investigation or the most searching inquiry, that our office records were proof of our honesty, honor, and integrity, and that the future would prove the correctness of our views and the real patriotism and loyalty of those who preached peace and plenty, rather than merciless mass murder and misery.

What I know of your connection with Labor's National Peace Council will ever be a credit to you, and will but tend to increase the esteem and regard of all when the truth is eventually known.

Fraternally, yours,

L. P. STRAUBE.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the publication that is spoken of in that letter of Mr. Straube, being the only thing that was issued during the time I was connected with the Labor National Peace Council.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to insert the matter in the RECORD as a part of his speech. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the matter referred to:

LABOR'S NATIONAL PEACE COUNCIL—THE REASONS FOR ITS EXISTENCE, TOGETHER WITH THE LABORS THAT DEMAND ITS ATTENTION.

War constitutes the seedtime of human misery and the harvest time of inhuman greed.

As proof of the former one needs but glance at the columns of the daily press, which, in spite of the active censorship at work, is replete with soul-sickening accounts of the unspeakable horrors that are incidental to a condition of murderous strife. Lust, loot, and license, the triple evils which have for ages been regarded as the special privileges of warriors, seem, in spite of our boasted advancement in civilization, to still be an inseparable condition of war, if the blood-soaked pages of European history now being written by flame and sword are to be believed.

THE SEEDTIME OF HUMAN MISERY.

The appalling sacrifice of human lives, totaling into the millions, and still continuing with unabated force, while stupendous in character, deals only with the dead whom the Grim Reaper has put beyond the power to feel further suffering; the crippled remnants of what once were men in the full vigor and pride of mental and physical strength, and the army of children, whose pinched faces and puny forms are the direct result of war, constitute a most pathetic appeal for peace.

The anguished groans of outraged womanhood, instructed by a monstrously selfish Government to lay aside all the refinements of their nature and submit themselves to the embrace of the soldiers ordered to the front, so that the governmental edict "Breed before you die" might be effectually consummated, coupled with the heart-rending cries of bereaved mothers, wives, and orphans doomed to suffer privation and want in their most revolting and hideous forms, is a spectacle so pitiful that it robs war of all the attributes of patriotism, honor, and glory its advocates continually strive to invest it with.

Who have and must do practically all the fighting that is done? Who compose the forces in the rifle pits and trenches? The privileged 5 per cent of the warring nations or the 95 per cent constituting the toilers of such country?

Who are those who profit by war; those who at the close of a war return to find homes in ruins, family dispersed, fields despoiled, stock stolen, credit destroyed, physical health impaired, victims of disease contracted in their country's service, or crippled, to the extent of being a burden instead of a help; or are they the hypocritical merchant princes and captains of industry who stayed at home, living in luxurious ease and comfort, preaching public patriotism while practicing private graft, and then decline to employ or support those who fought the fight because of their physical incapacity?

Who pays the enormous war debts, largely representing exorbitant profits exacted by modern business Shylocks, eager to commercialize their country's need and enrich themselves at the public's expense? Is it the criminal rich or the conscientious wealth-producing citizen?

The answer to these questions can be found in the pages of the world's history and in the experience-purchased knowledge possessed by every reader, which must convince even the most skeptical that war, be it great or small, is, has, and ever will be the seedtime of human misery.

THE HARVEST TIME OF INHUMAN GREED.

It is well said that those who control the credit and money of this country control the business of the country. Since rich men do not keep much money in the banks, but use bank credit, which passes the same as money, the natural question arises: Where does the money come from upon which the credit given the business world is based? That money represents the meager profits of the small business man, the comfort-denying savings of the working people, the petty household economics of the nation's wives and mothers, the poor widow's hoarded mite and the pennies of the country's children, who, patronizing a bank to insure the safe-keeping of their money, put the sum total of their combined wealth in the control of the bankers with whom they deposit it.

The control of all this money by a few men is a dangerous thing. If all of these men are honest, impartial, wise, and prudent, then all is well and good. But if a part of these men prove greedy, dishonest, and imprudent, then the control becomes a public evil, for those bankers who are greedy, dishonest, and imprudent can and do create financial panics that result in the demoralization of business which may cause bank failures and business failures, men are thrown out of work, wages are reduced, and the farmers can not dispose of their products. The people who have deposited their money in the banks can not draw it out, and they are helpless until conditions are relieved. When money is tight, it is the business man, the farmer, and the people at large who must suffer. But the banker profits, for he secures higher rates for money and is enabled to buy securities at low prices.

War, with its insistent demands for cash in unlimited quantities, is the time when exorbitant profits are exacted to the smallest fraction of a penny, not only by the smug-faced financial pirates, known as bankers, but their equally merciless brothers in crime, the commercial buccaneers that deal in war supplies and equipment.

Does such a condition serve as tenable basis for the statement that war is the harvest time of inhuman greed?

THE PEOPLE'S PART IN WAR.

If the constant press plea for financial contributions to relieve the distress of the European masses, without food, clothes, or shelter are true, war in that battle-scarred portion of the earth does not mean either progress or prosperity for the people; and if the army of jobless American toilers is any indication, the boasted prosperity of America is confined to big business alone and is not permitted to filter through to the common people.

The only conclusion an intelligent mind can arrive at, after an exhaustive study of all that the most ardent champion of militarism and war can offer to support the ancient theory of might makes right, is that peace is essential to progress and prosperity, while war means nothing else but waste, worry, and woe.

As labor represents that 95 per cent of the people which suffer most through war, it is but natural that it constitute that element of human society most directly and vitally concerned in the preservation of peace, and its efforts in that direction, though ridiculed by some and derided by others, will never and can never be construed by the fair-minded as the expression of moral or physical cowardice that shrinks from war's sacrifices through lack of personal courage.

REPORT OF AMERICA'S FRATERNAL DELEGATES.

In the year 1913, long before the murderous European slaughter had been inaugurated, Messrs. C. L. Baine and Louis Kemper, as the fraternal delegates representing the American Federation of Labor to the British Trades-Union Congress, on their return reported in part to the organized workers of America as follows:

"One of the strongest impressions made upon the minds of your delegates while attending the Congress was the prevailing sentiment against international wars. There seemed to be a general sentiment that trade-unionists would not be pawns in the game of international war as played by political or commercial interests for financial or territorial aggrandizement, and that the trade-unionists of the world, bound together in bonds of fraternity, strengthened by the annual visitations of delegates from each country to the others, would enter their most emphatic protest against being rendered as food for cannon and other implements of war at the behest of their despoilers. To our minds the international trade-union movement has become already the greatest guaranty for international peace, and will be recognized as such in the near future by all who are interested in preserving the human race from the ravages of warfare."

As evidence that the sentiment prevalent in England was not confined to Great Britain alone, we need but turn to the report rendered to the American Federation of Labor by George W. Perkins, president International Cigar Makers' Union, who served as its fraternal delegate to the World's Congress of Trades-Unions, held at Zurich, Switzerland, September, 1913, at which the following countries were represented: England, France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Finland, Germany, Austria, Boznia-Herzegovina, Hungary, Croatia, Switzerland, Italy, Spain, and the United States.

In this report the conclusions of Delegate Perkins were presented in part as follows:

"The trade-union movement of Europe has had a greater influence in preventing the wars between civilized nations than all other influences combined. During the Morocco squabble, and when England, France, and Germany stood ready to grapple in the death struggle, stood on the verge of war with all its horror, misery, and privation, let it be said to the everlasting credit of the trade-unionists of France that they made it clearly understood and known to the Government that they were opposed to a war of conquest. The French trade-unionists immediately communicated with England and Germany, and while it was deemed not advisable that a conference be held to discuss war and its prevention, it was diplomatically decided that the delegation of French trade-unionists should visit Germany and England on a study tour of social and economic questions. About 70 trade-unionists went to each country. They spent several days in Germany, in which time both the German and French leaders quietly talked against war. This all culminated in a mass meeting held in Berlin and which over 30,000 people attended. Outwardly the meeting was to talk over social and economic questions, but inwardly the working people, at least, knew it was to be a protest against a war with France over the Morocco situation.

"This substantial demonstration immediately had its effect upon Germany. The French delegates immediately hurried home, where similar tactics were employed. Mass meetings of protest against war with Germany or England over the Morocco question were held all over France, and resolutions of protest against the war were unanimously adopted. The same influences were at work in England, and I assert without fear of successful contradiction that the trade-union movement of these three countries actually prevented what would have been one of the bloodiest and costliest wars, had it taken place, that has ever occurred in Europe. The trade-union movement, if nothing else, has taught the workers of all the countries that wars of conquest bring home to the workers who are fortunate to live through the war nothing but misery, degradation, and poverty, and after all it is the greatest agency for peace the world possesses.

"It has dispelled the hatred that formerly existed between the workingmen of different countries, and has brought about in its stead a feeling of brotherly love and kindly consideration which augers well for the more speedy development of the international trade-union movement.

GEORGE W. PERKINS'S PROPHECY.

"Personally I am of the opinion that standing armies of continental Europe are maintained not so much for the purpose of repelling foreign invasion, but rather to hold in subjection the workers and to repel any uprising or revolution which the intolerable conditions might inspire in them. Continental Europe as it exists to-day is standing on a volcano, glossed over with a thin veneer of flowers, song, music, art, old buildings, and traditions. Remove these, and there might be an eruption that would shake the civilized word to its very foundations. Where will it end? The answer, reflected on the banner of the advancing hosts of trade-unionists, is that as the trade-union movement develops, it will bring order out of chaos. It will restore, in so far as it is possible, conditions to a more equitable level, and bring into the lives of the workers of these otherwise beautiful countries some sunlight, some happiness, and the opportunity and ability to enjoy life as befits human beings and advancing civilization."

Not many months after the submission of the Perkins report, the suggested volcanic eruption burst forth with a fury and devastating effect that has grown brain staggering in its immensity, and prompted the executive council of the American Federation of Labor in its report to the thirty-fourth annual convention held at Philadelphia, Pa., from 9th to 21st of November, 1914, to make a statement on international war and peace, of which the following are extracts:

DECLARATION OF AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

"A stupendous conflict is shaking to its foundations the structures of world civilization. The normal relations of commerce and interchange have been disrupted. In Europe values placed upon the interests and purposes of human activity have been reversed.

"Before the war the thought and effort of civilization was centered upon the development and the glorification of human life. One life was counted of infinite value. The end of progress, development, and work was that each individual might have life more abundantly. Indefatigable minds have forced understanding of the unknown that human life might be protected and conserved and that all the forces and resources of the universe might be put under the control of the will of man. Hearts that were great with love and understanding of the yearnings and aspirations that lie in every life sought to bring beauty and joy into the common life of all. Over all the world was felt the stir of that great ideal—the fellowship of men.

"But since the cataclysm that brought war between nations all the skill, the inventions, the knowledge of civilization have been perverted to purposes of destruction of human life and devastation of the products of human labor. Men are treated as only military pawns, to obey implicitly the command of the general. They are targets for the most perfect guns and destructive ammunition human minds have invented. Things are valued for their life-destroying power. Guns are worth more than men. The value of military position is estimated in terms of human lives. The life and the property of the individual are ruthlessly sacrificed to ends of war.

"The cruelty and butchery of the war are appalling. The waste and the suffering in its wake are heart-rending. The blackened homes, the ruined lives, the long procession of homeless, seeking food and shelter from the hands of strangers—all these are the products of war. There are nations that are sending the flower of their manhood to meet almost certain death. The strong, the healthy, the fit leave the work of the nation to the old and the very young, to women and to children. For centuries the nations will suffer from this mad, stupid waste, for the fathers of the next generation will be the unfit, physically and mentally, those whose vision or hearing is imperfect, those of undersize and subnormal development.

"Yet this war, with its terrific toll of human lives, is the product of artificial conditions and policies, and is repugnant to the thought and political progress of the age. The big things of life and civilization are international. But so far we have made little effort or progress in providing agencies for organizing international relations to maintain peace and justice. We realize intellectually that peace and justice should obtain among nations, but we have not yet instituted permanent means adequate to make that conviction a reality.

"A time when we are confronted by the effects and the appalling realities of a most terrible war is a peculiarly appropriate opportunity for the people to think out methods and agencies for the maintenance of peace. The terrible consequences of war which are forced upon us everywhere envelop peace plans with an unusual atmosphere of practicability and urgency. The appeal for peace is getting very close to the American people, the only great Nation not directly involved in the war, and consequently the Nation that holds in its hands the power of mediation and use of its good offices. This opportunity constitutes a duty, if we really believe in the fellowship of men and the sacredness of human life.

"For years peace societies and organizations have presented arguments for peace, have adopted peace resolutions, and have declared for various international sentiments, but they have made little effort to give these visions reality in the organization of society and the relations among nations. But the war has shown that war can not be stopped by paper resolutions and that war can not put an end to itself. Wars will cease only when society is convinced that human life is really sacred and when society establishes agencies, international as well as national, for protecting lives.

"We profess to believe that all men have inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, but we do not see to it that these rights are secured to each individual. Industry is conducted upon the supposition that human life is cheap. Profits are held to be the ultimate end of business. Therefore business managers must get profits and, in furthering the getting, sacrifice the workers in the process. Employers cold-bloodedly calculate in money terms the relative expensiveness of machinery and workers, of the 8-hour day and the 12-hour day, of child labor and adult labor, of compensation for loss of life and limb and preventing measures. In coal mines, steel works, and in transportation human life is risked and sacrificed with cynical disregard. We profess to believe in democratic freedom, yet domination of power so ruthlessly prevails in industry.

"Consider the statistics of industrial accidents, injuries, and deaths. In harmony with this waste of human life in industry is waste of human life in a crude effort to decide political issues on the battle field.

"When we realize the wonderful possibilities in permitting each individual to develop his abilities and do his work with a sound mind and body, then shall we appreciate the sanctity of living and we shall not dare to hamper development in any way. When this ideal becomes a part of our daily thinking and doing and working, then fellow beings will not be robbed of that which no one has the power to restore—life. The establishment of this ideal of the sacredness of life is a problem of education. It must be drilled into people, made a part of their very being, and must saturate every mental fiber.

"It is not only that we are shocked at the waste of human life, but that we have not yet adjusted ourselves to this particular kind of waste—waste in war. We must realize the awful responsibility for the loss of human life opportunity with clearness and with understanding of the meaning of that waste that nothing will prevent our putting an end to all preventable waste. When conviction is sufficiently compelling, practical results will follow. Education and agitation are necessary to create that conviction. Those who wish to abolish war must lose no opportunity to implant the ethics of humanity, to make the sacredness of human life a part of the thought and action of the nations. The power to declare war must be put in the hands of the people or their chosen representatives.

"In addition to establishing a sentiment and a conviction for peace, there must be agencies established for the maintenance of peaceful relations among nations and for dealing with international issues. Militarism and competitive armament must be abolished and tribunals for awarding justice and agencies for enforcing determinations must be instituted. International interests and issues exist. Political institutions should be established, corresponding to political developments.

"Those most interested should lead in the demands for world federation and the rule of reason between nations. The working people of all lands bear the brunt of war. They do the fighting, pay the war taxes, suffer most from the disorganization of industry and commerce which results from war.

"The national labor movement can promote the cause of international peace by two complementary lines of action, by creating and stimulating with their own nations a public sentiment that will not tolerate waste of life, and by establishing international relations, understanding, and agencies that will constitute an insuperable barrier to policies of force and destruction. With humanization, education, cultivation, the establishment of the rule of reason, occasions for wars and wars themselves will cease. The working people, the masses of the world's population, can end wars if they will but have the independence to think and to give their convictions reality by daring to do.

"This convention should—aye, must—adopt some constructive suggestion and take some tangible action upon this world problem which so intimately affects the workers of all countries."

ORGANIZED LABOR'S ATTITUDE AND RESULTS.

Notwithstanding the American Federation of Labor's declaration that "the war can not be stopped by paper resolutions, nor can it put an end to itself," the organized workers of America continued to express their belief that war was not only horrible but unnecessary, unintelligent, and avoidable, through the medium of beautiful phrased resolutions, that promised much but accomplished little of real merit, with what result?

The covetous eyes of the commercial ghouls, fiendishly gloating over the nefarious profits, represented by the corpse-strewn battle fields of Europe, turned with hellish purpose toward the United States of America, and, finding themselves unchallenged by any positive evidence of active, organized opposition, grew bold in their satanic design to embroil the land of the free and the home of the brave in the European quarrel and force its people to add their quota toward increasing the blood-stained fortunes of the patriotic (?) international war mongers.

So self-satisfied was this malignant tribe of dollar lovers regarding the supposed fatuous character of the American people, that they exercised no care to conceal their hideous intent, but brazenly invoked aid in the name of patriotism and all the virtues that the Star-Spangled Banner of the United States represents.

THE FIRST PRACTICAL STEP.

Recognizing the need for immediate action to circumvent the avowed purpose of these Judas Iscariots, a group of trades-unionists of Chicago, inspired by the suggestion of the American Federation of Labor's executive council in 1914, agreed among themselves to act as the pioneers that would blaze a path through the tangled brush and timber of national apathy, and, with this thought in mind, called a conference of labor representatives in the executive board rooms of the Chicago Federation of Labor, and, after a series of meetings, brought into being an organization with the significant title "Labor's Peace Council of Chicago," which body, at its session held on June 18, 1915, adopted the following self-explanatory program:

"Resolved, That Labor's Peace Council of Chicago, through official channels, communicate with all labor organizations that have placed themselves on record as favoring peace at home and abroad, and urge upon them to select and credential delegates to attend the Peace Conference of Labor, to be held under the direction of the Hon. FRANK BUCHANAN, president of Labor's Peace Council of Chicago, in the city of Washington, D. C., on Tuesday, June 22, 1915, for the purpose of considering the best method of procedure to insure the attainment of organized labor's high ideals and peace sentiments."

WASHINGTON, D. C., PEACE CONFERENCE.

Pursuant to this call, Washington, D. C., on June 22, 1915, witnessed a gathering of labor representatives from various metropolitan centers, who further carried on the work for peace by the adoption of the following resolutions:

"Whereas the purpose of this call, for a peace congress in labor's name, is to crystallize the prevailing sentiment for peace, voiced by the organized toilers of America through resolutions, into practical action that will not only effectually circumvent the hellish designs of the dollar-crazed interests that for the sake of financial gain are striving to force the United States into the vortex of war's crimson flood of human gore, but will also serve as the long-prayed-for excuse that Europe's organized workers have been straining their ears to hear from American shores, and that will enable them to demand, in the name of common humanity, a cessation of hostilities, in order that calm reason may prevail and common sense sit in judgment and end a cruel conflict that has already destroyed the very flower of Europe's army of labor, and is daily claiming hundreds of thousands more, while piling up a war indebtedness that will be left as a spirit-breaking heritage for the maimed and disease-ridden human remnants to pay through further sacrifices and untold future misery; and

"Whereas the American Federation of Labor and most of the labor federations, assemblies, or councils in the large metropolitan centers have adopted strong resolutions not only condemning war, and, in forcible language, voicing a most strenuous protest against the insidious efforts being made to embroil the United States of America in the European conflict, and in the same emphatic manner also courageously and in the interest of humanity favoring a peace universal; and

"Whereas the American Federation of Labor and its various departmental branches, as well as the labor federations, assemblies, or councils in the metropolitan centers, are so overburdened with work dealing with various problems of direct and vital interest to their membership, that in spite of their inclination they can not find time to devote to the detailed labor essential to properly arousing the conscience of labor and urge it to make its presence felt in the preservation of American neutrality and the inauguration of peace universal; and

"Whereas it therefore devolves upon labor's representatives assembled here to prove the courage of their convictions by the establishment of a national institution having for its sole aim and object the carrying into effect, through practical action, of the essence of labor's oft-reiterated declaration for peace both at home and abroad; and to effect such purpose, be it

"Resolved by the representatives of labor in peace congress assembled in the city of Washington, D. C., That an organization be, and is hereby, established, to be known as Labor's National Peace Council, having for its purpose the establishment and maintenance of peace universal by all honorable means; and be it further

"Resolved, That the officers of Labor's National Peace Council shall consist of a president, six vice presidents, a treasurer, a secretary, and a sergeant at arms, same to be elected immediately, upon the adoption of this resolution, and such officers elect shall act in their official capacity in conducting the further business of Labor's National Peace Council."

In conformity with the provisions of the foregoing resolution the following officers were elected to direct the further activities of Labor's National Peace Council:

Congressman FRANK BUCHANAN, former international president Bridge and Structural Iron Workers, was elected president of Labor's National Peace Council.

First vice president, Milton Snellings, Washington, D. C., of Stationary and Steam Operating Engineers' International Union.

Second vice president, William F. Kramer, Chicago, general secretary-treasurer International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers.

Third vice president, Rudolph Modest, New York, Amalgamated Meat Cutters of America.

LABOR'S NATIONAL PEACE COUNCIL PROGRAM.

In its further deliberations Labor's National Peace Council was guided by the attitude assumed by the American Federation of Labor at its Philadelphia convention in 1914, through the adoption of resolution No. 159, introduced by Delegate Paul Scharrenberg, of the California State Federation of Labor, which reads as follows:

"Whereas one of the main causes for the maintenance of large military and naval establishments, and which is a standing menace to peace between nations, is to be found in the fact that patent rights on and the manufacture of arms, munitions, and implements of war are in the hands of international combinations of capitalists, who sell their products indiscriminately to the Governments of the world and promote the sale of such products by arousing and encouraging feelings of national prejudice and jealousy and by employing the press and the officers of the Army and Navy to produce periodical war scares in different countries; and

"Whereas this menace to international peace can be eliminated and the ultimate disarmament promoted by having the Government manufacture its own equipment and articles used for war purposes: Therefore, be it

"Resolved by the American Federation of Labor, in thirty-fourth annual convention assembled, That all patent rights for arms, munitions, and other equipment to be used for war purposes should be acquired by the Government, and all such equipment should be manufactured in Government establishments."

CONGRESSMAN TAVENNER'S DISCLOSURES.

The absolute necessity for action, as outlined in the foregoing resolution, being conclusively demonstrated by the soul-stirring remarks of the Hon. CLYDE H. TAVENNER, Congressman from Illinois, delivered in the House of Representatives on February 15, 1915, when he said, in part, as follows:

"Is there no way whatever, it may be asked, by which the people can protect themselves from the greed of the War Trust magnates? Yes; just one way. That is by the Government taking the profit out of war and preparation for war by manufacturing all of its own munitions, armor, cannon, and battleships. Both Washington and Lincoln advocated the nationalization of the manufacture of war munitions as sound public policy.

"If the Government will manufacture all of its own war materials, millions of dollars will be saved annually to the taxpayers as a result of the already demonstrated ability of Uncle Sam to manufacture at a cost much below the prices of the War Trust, as I shall show. Government manufacture will mean that the workmen who perform the labor of actually making the munitions will receive higher wages and better working conditions than the employees of the ring of private contractors receive, as these firms number among them the most bitter enemies of organized labor in the United States, working 51 per cent of their employees 12 hours a day, according to a report of the United States Bureau of Labor made just after an investigation in 1910.

"Fortunate, indeed, would it be for this Nation to-day if the Government had a monopoly of the manufacture of all munitions of war. It is not the average American, the man who will be required to do the fighting and pay the bills if we become embroiled in the European conflict, who is jeopardizing our peace. The average American is remaining at home, attending to his business. It is the ring of war-trafficking private arms and ammunition firms who are endangering the peace and welfare of 100,000,000 people in order that they may satisfy their greed for profit. If we go to war, it will not be on account of anything the average American has done, but because as a Nation we have neglected to safeguard our peace by taking the profit out of war and preparation for war.

WHO THE WAR TRADERS ARE.

"Because I believe it is my duty to do so, I desire now to take the responsibility of directing the attention of the American people to the fact that their money appropriated for the Army and Navy is being wasted by the millions, and to take the responsibility of identifying the war traffickers, so that the taxpayers may know where the millions upon millions of their money that has been dumped into the bottomless pit of militarism have been going, are going, and will continue to go unless public opinion shall arise in its might and demand that further waste of public funds shall cease.

"To begin with, who and what is the armor ring, if there really is such an animal? Is the term 'armor ring' a mere figure of speech, something invisible, or is it possible definitely to place our finger upon it? Answer: It is possible.

"The armor ring is the Bethlehem Steel Co., the Midvale Steel Co., and the Carnegie Steel Co. These three firms, exclusive of their subsidiary war-trafficking auxiliaries, have drawn down since 1887 from the Navy Department alone for the single item of armor-plate contracts aggregating $95,628,912, divided as follows: Bethlehem, $42,321,237; Carnegie, $32,954,377; Midvale, $20,353,298.

"I have just stated that the armor ring is composed of the Bethlehem, Midvale, and Carnegie Cos. Remember the names!

"Now, the armament ring is composed of Midvale, Bethlehem, and Carnegie. Ammunition ring, Carnegie, Midvale, and Bethlehem. We will add to the ammunition ring, for good measure, the Du Pont Powder Trust, which has no competitors in the sale of smokeless powder to the Government, for reasons that will appear most remarkable when explained. The Powder Trust has obtained contracts aggregating about $25,000,000 since 1905.

SOME DEFINITE INFORMATION AS TO THE WASTING OF PUBLIC FUNDS.

"Why has the War Department been paying the ring $17.50 for a 3.8-inch common shrapnel, when it can manufacture and is manufacturing the identical article at Frankford for $7.94? Seventeen dollars is more than twice $7.94. The Government could manufacture two shrapnels for the price it has been paying the private manufacturers for one and have $1.62 remaining to the people's credit on each transaction. Is it any wonder we do not have as much ammunition as we should have for the money that has been expended? It is the public funds that are being spent here, and the people have a right to have these questions answered.

"We are manufacturing a 31-second combination fuse in the Government arsenal for $2.92 for which we have been paying the ring $7.

"These illustrations are not exceptional, as I will endeavor to show by the fact that on a contract given to the Frankford Arsenal for ammunition valued at $1,000,064 we are saving $979,840, or, in other words, we are saving approximately $1,000,000 on a $2,000,000 order as compared with what it would have cost had that contract been awarded the ammunition ring.

"In a recent speech before Congress President Wilson stated that 'like good stewards, we should so account for every dollar of our appropriations as to make it perfectly evident what it was spent for and in what way it was spent.' Surely no such thought was in the minds of the Army and Navy officials who have been doing the purchasing for those departments.

"It would require several volumes to cover all the transactions deserving publicity concerning armor. Let it be sufficient in passing to say that the Government purchase of armor has been a scandal from start to finish. The conduct of the armor ring in dealing with the Government averages throughout at least 80 per cent rotten.

METHODS OF THE WAR TRAFFICKERS IN KEEPING UP BUSINESS.

"There are tricks in all trades. If the people of the several powers can be incited to mutual distrust, suspicion, and hatred, for instance, it means increased dividends for the stockholders of the war traffickers in each country.

"The several leading powers aim to increase their naval strength in the same proportion. If one of the powers can be induced to take on an additional superdreadnaught, it is used as an argument as to why the other leading powers should do the same. It works as an endless chain, with the war burden ever and ever increasing on the backs of the taxpayers of the world.

"If a new design can be worked out, that, too, means more grist for the shipbuilders. It calls for the speedy 'scrapping' of the vessels already on hand as 'obsolete,' 'scrapping' meaning throwing on the scrap heap as old junk. So the life of the battleship is ever lessening.

"Another trick in the trade of the war traders which is obviously profitable, otherwise it would not be continued, is the hiring of retired Army and Navy officials and ex-Members of Congress by the powder, armor, and shipbuilding concerns. These ex-officials know the inner workings of the military branches of the Government, know the personnel in an intimate way, and by private conversation, by correspondence, and in various ways are in a position to obtain much useful information. They know how to go about things for results. Through these ex-officials the War Trust has become thoroughly at home in Washington.

"There seems to be no limit to the extremes to which the war traders are willing to go for business.

INTERESTING FACTS WORTH KNOWING.

"Although scarcely believable, it is the proven fact that the British and German war trusts many years ago actually set about to represent to their respective home Governments that their rivals were planning to build and were building great armadas of giant fighting craft, which have since been proven absolutely to have been figments of the imagination, pure and simple. The same character of campaigns have been going on between France and Germany, between the countries in the triple alliance and the triple entente, and it is yet to be established whether the United States of America has not also been the victim of a similar brand of commercialism, in which patriotism is the means and profit the end.

"Misrepresentation as to the building program of Great Britain and Germany were carried on to such an extent that the papers became full of it and the suspicion of the people toward each other grew and grew. It was inevitable that there could be but one end to such proceedings, and that end was war.

"Specific information, replete with details, is available to show just how the work was carried on."

FURTHER JUSTIFICATION FOR RESOLUTION ADOPTED.

In addition to the reasons assigned by Congressman TAVENNER, that justify Government ownership, control, and manufacture of all war munitions, supplies and equipment, investigation discloses that under international law the assumption by the Government of complete ownership, control, and manufacture of all ammunitions, war supplies, and equipment would lessen the chances of a repetition of the present deplorable European dilemma, for it would prevent the cheap, narrow-gauged, and small-souled dollar patriot from reaping a golden harvest at the expense of his country's peace, while the Government itself could not supply any of the belligerents with war material, since such action would constitute a declaration of alliance with the nation so favored and signify a declaration of war against the country with which such nation was engaged.

ATTITUDE OF HIRELING PRESS.

As was to be expected, a prostituted public press rushed to the defense of the money grabbers threatened by such action, fondly hoping through a frantic appeal to prejudice and a system of puerile reasoning to avert the dreaded calamity of having their master's snouts forcibly dragged from the juicy graft, to be found in the trough of governmental contracts, and by such fancy word juggling as their statement, "Clever phrases are a dangerous substitute for sober thought." The present yammer about "take profit out of war" is a case in point, which they use as the introduction for a diatribe against governmental monopoly of war munitions and supplies and seek to prove the pretended innocence of war traders and war makers by saying, "We must not let phrases take the place of facts. The safety of the United States demands that we maintain the right of private individuals or corporations to manufacture and trade in arms and munitions of war."

REPLY TO PRESS CHARGES.

In response to this call for facts we again take the liberty of borrowing from the convincing statement of Congressman TAVENNER, in the House of Representatives, when he said:

"Army and Navy officers generally are opposed to complete Government manufacture of munitions of war, taking the position that it is the part of wisdom for the Government to encourage private manufacturers to operate plants so that they may be available in time of war. Experience has shown, however, that instead of patriotically coming to the relief of the Government in time of war, the war traders take advantage of the necessities of the Government, which is at their mercy, and boost their prices. For instance, when war with Spain was imminent the armor manufacturers practically issued an ultimatum to the Government that they would not manufacture a single piece of armor plate unless the Government should agree to pay them $100 a ton more than the price fixed by Congress after an investigation as to a fair price. And it is also worthy of notice that their patriotism did not prevent them from selling armor to Russia for $244 a ton, while they were asking their own Government $616 a ton.

ARMOR-PLATE PATRIOTISM IS WORLD-WIDE.

"There appears to be no real competition between the armor manufacturers of the various countries. Once, in 1903, the American armor ring made a noise like competition when it sold armor to Russia for $249, while charging the United States $616, and for a time great consternation prevailed in the ranks of the war trusts of the various nations.

"But during this period the armor manufacturers of the world met in Paris, and since then there has been little or no competition worthy of the name. The armor manufacturers asked themselves why they should cut each others' throats and why it would not be to their advantage to receive $500 or $600 a ton instead of $200 or $300?

"In the naval hearings for 1914, page 621, the present Secretary of the Navy, Josephus Daniels, used the following language in referring to an advertisement for bids for armor plate for the dreadnaught Pennsylvania:

"'When we came to the armor we rejected all the bids and were then absolutely in a situation from which it appeared there was no relief. Though you can not establish it in black and white, there is no doubt of an Armor Plate Trust all over the world. That is to say, the people abroad who make armor plate will not come here and submit bids, because they know if they do our manufacturers will go abroad and submit bids. They have divided the world, like Gaul, into three parts.'

"For more definite evidence of the tremendous syndication and wide sympathies of armor-plate patriotism an examination of the Harvey United Steel Co., of London, is instructive and entertaining.

POSITIVE EVIDENCE OF INTERNATIONAL COMBINE.

"The powder makers of the world, like the armor makers, have been in an international combine for years. Here are two paragraphs in the world agreement entered into in 1897, which agreement was used by the Government in its suit against the Du Pont trust:

"'Whenever the American factories receive an inquiry for any Government other than their own, either directly or indirectly, they are to communicate with the European factories through the chairman appointed, as hereinafter set forth, and by that means to ascertain the price which the European factories are quoting or have fixed, and they shall be bound not to quote or sell at any lower figure than the price at which the European factories are quoting or have fixed. Should the European factories receive an inquiry from the Government of the United States of North America or decide to quote for delivery for that Government, either directly or indirectly, they shall first in like manner ascertain the price quoted or fixed by the American factories and shall be bound not to quote or sell below that figure. * * *

"'The American factories are to abstain from manufacturing, selling, or quoting, directly or indirectly, in or for consumption in any of the European territory, and the Europeans are to abstain in like manner from manufacturing, selling, or quoting, directly or indirectly, in or for consumption in any of the countries of the American territory. With regard to the syndicated territory, neither party is to erect works there, except by a mutual understanding, and the trade there is to be carried on for joint account in the manner hereinafter defined.'

STILL MORE ASTOUNDING FACTS.

"Nor is this the worst. The Du Ponts and the Government have always been in the habit of exchanging all secrets in the manufacture of powder. Government chemists and Government officers are continually experimenting to improve the quality of powder, and whenever they make a discovery of any character full information is furnished the Du Ponts.

"And the Du Ponts have been in an agreement with a German firm—the United Rheinisch Westphalian Gunpowder Mills—to keep it informed of all improvements in the processes of powder making.

"Here is the actual wording of the contract:

"'Tenth. That any and every improvement upon said processes, or either of them, made by either of the parties hereto at any time hereafter shall forthwith be imparted to the other of the parties hereto.'

"And even this is not all. The Du Ponts agreed to keep the German concern informed at all times of all powder furnished to the United States Government, stating in detail its quality and characteristics, and even the quantity, making themselves, to all practical ends, paid informers of a foreign Government.

"Here is the exact language:

"'Thirteenth. That the parties of the second part (the Du Ponts) will, as soon as possible, inform the party of the first part (the German concern) of each and every contract for brown powder or nitrate of ammonia powder received by the parties of the second part from the Government of the United States, or any other contracting party or parties, stating in detail the quantity, price, time of delivery, and all of the requirements that the powder called for in such contract has to fulfill.'

"As the German Government maintains a strict supervision over German military manufacturing concerns, there can be little doubt but that the German Government knows of every pound of powder we purchased during the life of this agreement, its exact quality, and exactly the extent of our reserve supply."

RESOLUTION FOR IMMEDIATE RESULTS.

As an immediate and practical step toward harmony, Labor's National Peace Council deemed it both wise and expedient to adopt the following measure:

"Resolved, That Labor's National Peace Council recommend to the President of the United States that the policy of President Washington in 1793 prohibiting the sale and shipment of munitions of war be followed, by a proclamation prohibiting the sale and shipment to belligerent nations of munitions and instrumentalities of war, as well as of all materials used in the production and manufacture of the same; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be given to the President and Secretary of State as well as the Members of the Senate and House, and copies be given the labor and public press for publication."

REASONS FOR FURTHER ACTION.

In the discussion which arose as to the best method of procedure to secure at least an armistice, the consensus of opinion was that war in spite of all that can be said to the contrary, in its final analysis resolves itself into unacknowledged mistakes of the Governments involved, and is never the unanimous desire of those who must offer their bodies as cannon food and suffer the tortures of the damned to vindicate views that are inconsistent with the people's desire for social improvement, health, wealth, and the general pursuit of happiness, the attaining of which are only possible through the maintenance of peace.

It was further learned that when the Central Federated Union of greater New York and vicinity arranged its first demonstration in April, 1915, at Cooper Union, it was determined to cable the leading men in the labor movement in England, France, and Germany, suggesting that three representatives from this country should meet with their representatives in Holland and Switzerland for the purpose of arousing labor all over the world in a peace movement to end the awful European slaughter. Kier Hardie replied by cable for the independent labor party favoring the plan. France did not reply. The following letter, which is a copy, was received from Germany:

INTERNATIONAL SECRETARIAT OF NATIONAL TRADE UNION CENTERS,
Berlin, May 21, 1915.

Mr. ERNEST BOHM,
Central Federated Union, New York, U. S. A.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: On the 18th of April I received your wireless, the following advice having been added by the Berlin chief telegraph office:

"This telegram has been permitted to pass by wireless exceptionally. Under present conditions, however, it will not be possible of a reply or other private telegrams being sent to America the same way."

Thus, to my great regret, it was impossible for me to give an immediate response to your telegram, for the cable existing previously between Germany and the United States has been cut since the first days of the war. I had your wire published in the whole of the German labor press at once, so as to inform our workers of the desire of their American fellow workers to bring about peace.

It being impossible to let you have an immediate reply, I hesitated to write for I hoped to first be able to meet labor representatives of some of the European neutral nations with a view of ascertaining to what extent your mission might be expected to be a success and how it could be organized. Unfortunately my hopes were in vain. This compels me to reply to your wire on my own account, after a month has elapsed.

Our fellow workers in the United States may be assured that the working classes of Germany are eagerly waiting for peace, for the termination of this bloody struggle of nations. If this desire is not expressed daily in our papers and meetings, then it is due to the fact that we are in an extremely peculiar and delicate position. The majority of the organized workers in Great Britain and in France maintain, according to what we learn from their own labor papers, that Germany must be smashed. I need not dwell here on the consequences the realization of such a desire would have for the future development of the international labor movement. All our efforts made with a view to coming to an understanding have failed. The representatives of the German workers, on August 4, 1914, have stated as follows in the Reichstag:

"That as soon as the object of security has been achieved and the enemy is inclined toward peace, the war should be brought to an end by a peace which makes the friendship of the neighboring countries possible."

This same statement has been repeated in the Reichstag on December 2, 1914, and on March 10, 1915, while a further manifesto in favor of peace has been published by the social democratic parties of Germany, Austria, and Hungary on April 13, 1915. Unfortunately no similar pronouncement has come from our sister parties of the other two countries of western Europe. It would, indeed, be a task worth while if the delegation the workers of the United States intend sending to Europe were to make an understanding possible.

We are extremely thankful for all efforts the American workers may make in this direction and you may rest assured that any suggestion will be welcomed by the German workers. The desire for peace, which fills all really progressive and civilized men in every country, is sure to be realized if your efforts meet with similar response in the other belligerent countries.

With best wishes to the cause of labor in all lands,

Yours, fraternally,

C. LEGIEN,
President German Federation of Trade Unions and International Federation of Trade Unions.

LABOR'S NATIONAL PEACE COUNCIL ACTS.

The logical sequence of these disclosures was the unanimous adoption of the following resolution:

"Whereas one of the chief objects of Labor's National Peace Council is the attainment of universal peace; and

"Whereas this desired aim can only be accomplished through the medium of cooperative action on the part of the neutral and belligerent Governments as well as the labor forces of the neutral and belligerent countries: Therefore be it

"Resolved, By Labor's National Peace Council in special session assembled in the city of Washington, D. C., that through its officers it communicate with the neutral European Governments as well as the belligerent Governments involved in the conflict and also the organized labor forces in both neutral and belligerent countries, urging them to formulate a request for the cessation of hostilities so as to permit the reestablishment of reason and judgment, thereby ending a barbarous conflict that threatens civilization and checks all hope of human progress."

THE PURPOSE OF THE RESOLUTION.

Since men do not, as a rule, voluntarily seek death, even though they may have no hesitancy in offering up their own lives under sufficient provocation, yet they would decline to deliberately sentence their loved ones to war's enforced destitution and corrupting influences, and as the common people were but pawns shoved around the governmental chessboard at the will and whim of the war makers, it was felt that if they, the people, could be induced to voice their real sentiments in an organized way every utterance would be a prayer for peace.

A MENACE TO AMERICAN NEUTRALITY.

In addition to this suggestion to the foreign powers and the labor forces under their jurisdiction, Labor's National Peace Council adopted a further resolution providing for the immediate calling of an extra session of the United States Congress for the express purpose of promoting universal peace, not merely through a temporary cessation of hostilities but through the organized cooperation of all nations under law.

Since the Washington meeting of Labor's National Peace Council, Ex-Congressman H. Robert Fowler, as its general counsel, has been instructed to file a brief with the Federal Reserve Board charging that the United States has been involved in grave breaches of neutrality "through the medium of an extensive conspiracy composed of certain bankers and officers of Federal reserve banks and member banks acting in conjunction with agents of Great Britain, France, and Russia." J. P. Morgan & Co. and that firm's business allies, are named as chiefly responsible for the alleged "conspiracy," through which it is asserted that out of the enormous sum of $220,000,000 utilized in the purchase and shipments of war materials for European belligerents, approximately $20,000,000 of that amount had been obtained from Federal reserve banks, and this action, together with the further attempts of these financial kings to secure the issuance of a tremendous block of Federal reserve notes, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, to be used for the same purpose, constituted a grave danger that menaced the peace of the United States of America.

PRESS PARTISANSHIP.

It has been insolently assumed by a part of the American press, for reasons that have never been satisfactorily explained, that there is but one point of view as to the European war.

Any attempt by right thinking Americans to form an independent opinion has been, and continues to be, ruthlessly, violently, brutally throttled by the partisan press.

As evidence conclusively demonstrating the pernicious influences that make modern newspapers so unreliable a source of information and by their methods strangle truth, rape justice, and insult the intelligence of the people, permit us to point out "that Lord Northcliffe is the owner of the London Times, the Daily Mail (commonly called the 'Daily Liar,' and the Evening News." He is also the controlling factor in the Nowoja Wremja, the leading paper in Russia, the Matin of Paris, and owner of the Daily Mail published in Paris. He is also credited with having big interests in several important American papers and supplies the cable news to a number of papers published in New York and elsewhere.

The various Governments involved in the European conflict have furnished sufficient evidence to prove that the citizens of those nations had no voice in deciding the question of war and would gladly embrace any opportunity that would lead to the war's immediate or speedy termination.

They are helpless, they have been robbed of the power of initiative.

The United States is neutral, and so long as it remains neutral its citizens occupy the enviable position of being permitted to exercise their every influence in the direction of peace without having their moral or physical courage questioned or their honesty, honor, and integrity impugned.

Universal peace, that humanizing sentiment that is the thought by day and the dream by night of countless of God's children, whose hearts throb with sympathy for the victims of man's inhumanity to his fellow men, is the aim and object of Labor's National Peace Council and all those identified with it, and constitutes the incentive for its glorious work of world redemption from the prevalent blood lust that holds sway.

WHERE DO YOU STAND ON THAT QUESTION?—ARE YOU FOR OR AGAINST PEACE?.

Do you want to help save your country from becoming involved in the European tragedy and aid in bringing to a quick close the bloody chapter of European history that is being written by the sword dipped in human blood? If you do, talk to your family, your intimate friends, your acquaintances, and others you come in contact with, who are peace advocates, arrange a meeting, and establish a local branch of Labor's National Peace Council, select your officers, and advise the national officers at headquarters, Briggs House, Chicago, Ill., of the formation of your organization, and by mail you will be advised along what lines to proceed in order to render the most effective service, to bring into being peace universal and earn a world's undying gratitude.

Fraternally, yours,

LABOR'S NATIONAL PEACE COUNCIL,
FRANK BUCHANAN, President.
L. P. STRAUBE, Secretary.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the erroneous statements in the newspapers mislead and poison the minds of their readers, and it becomes necessary for me to use other mediums than the big daily newspapers, which generally represent the war trust, to get the truth before the people, and therefore I feel called upon to make a statement to the Members of the House of Congress and to my constituents in regard to the erroneous statements that have appeared in the big war trust daily newspapers and also the indictment that has been returned against me in New York, all of which are without foundation of fact or truth.

I have always been opposed to war and in favor of establishing a condition where we would have some guaranty of peace. For the last 20 years, or since being active in the labor movement or in public life, I have taken advantage of every opportunity I saw to exert my influence to establish peace, so that we might be able to make some progress on the road to the fellowship of man. Since being a Member of Congress I have exerted my influence to secure Government manufacture of munitions of war and war supplies for three reasons: First, because I believe that if you take the profit out of traffic in munitions of war you will destroy one of the strongest influences that agitates extravagant and unnecessary expenditures of the people's money for war purposes; second, because it gives workingmen more work under better working conditions; third, because the Government secures better supplies at a large saving in money.

I have always been opposed to traffic in munitions of war to belligerent nations, and was keenly disappointed when our administration acquiesced in this traffic in machines of death. I believed the administration had the power to curtail such traffic, if not to stop it entirely. I also believe it is unneutral to furnish munitions of war to one side in this conflict when the other could not obtain it. I would have taken the same position if conditions had been reversed and the allies could not get munitions when the Germans could. Because I have taken that position I have been charged with being pro-German, which charge is erroneous. My people came to this country perhaps 250 years ago. My mother tells me that her mother's people came to this country with the Pilgrims from England. If I have any German blood in my veins, it is yet to be discovered; and while I am in sympathy with all the people in those European war-stricken nations, I absolutely take no sides with any Government in this conflict. My sole desire has been to play a small part, if possible, in bringing that war to an early and proper termination and to stop the awful destruction of human life and those things that tend to make life worth living. My keen desire to be of service to that end might have caused me to err, but I have done nothing in connection with the activities of Labor's National Peace Council or otherwise for which I feel called upon to offer an excuse or an apology.

After the sinking of the Lusitania and during the negotiations between Germany and this Government, I received information that impressed me that there was danger of this country becoming involved; and while the sinking of the Lusitania was an act on the part of Germany that could not be approved by men of humane instincts, the campaign directed by the Rockefeller system in Colorado, depriving citizens of their constitutional and fundamental rights and employing gunmen to murder women and children and shoot down defenseless citizens, is a far greater crime and offense against the fundamental principles of our Government and the rights of our people than anything that has occurred in the war zone, yet this administration has not called upon Mr. Rockefeller and his cohorts to make redress. I could see no justification for this country becoming involved in the European war, which would have meant the loss of tens of thousands of the flower of the manhood of our country, made tens of thousands of women widows and children orphans, as well as the piling up of billions of dollars of indebtedness to bear heavy on the backs of the wealth producers of the country. I therefore became active in trying to create a sentiment among the people whom I met against war. I took advantage of every opportunity to talk to labor men, either individually or in their meetings, and, as I remember it, asked them to pass resolutions opposing this country becoming involved in the war. I believed at that time that the President of the United States desired to maintain peace, and it was my desire to sustain him in that position and uphold his hand, so to speak, so that he might resist any influences that were trying to get him to yield in taking steps toward war.

The first effort that I remember that led to the organization of Labor's National Peace Council was made by a group of trade-unionists who got together in the city of Chicago about June 18, 1915, and formed what they called Labor's Peace Council of Chicago. I was not in Chicago at the time, but at the request of some of my trade-union friends there I consented to be selected president of the council during my absence from Chicago. This council, also, during my absence from Chicago, communicated with other labor organizations that had placed themselves on record as favoring peace at home and abroad, and urged upon them to select and credential delegates to attend the Peace Conference of Labor, which was to be held under my direction in the city of Washington, D. C., on Tuesday, June 22, 1915, for the purpose of considering the best methods of procedure to insure the attainment of organized labor's high ideals and peace sentiments. In response to this call, representatives of organized labor from a number of our large cities met at the St. James Hotel, Washington, D. C., June 22, 1915, and organized what is known as Labor's National Peace Council. At the request of a number of my trade-union friends, I reluctantly became its president. I say reluctantly, not because I was not in full accord with the purposes of the council as declared in that meeting, but because I believed that the organization should consist solely of active trade-unionists, and while I am still a member of a labor union, my activities in the union ceased 10 years ago. However, I insisted that other officers of Labor's National Peace Council should be active trade-unionists. I was elected president, and the other officers were as follows:

First vice president, Milton Snellings, Washington, D. C., of Stationary and Steam Operating Engineer's International Union.

Second vice president, William F. Kramer, Chicago, general secretary-treasurer International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers.

Third vice president, Rudolph Modest, New York, Amalgamated Meat Cutters of America.

Fourth vice president, Jacob C. Taylor, East Orange, N. J., secretary-treasurer Federated Central Body of the States of New York and New Jersey.

Secretary, L. P. Straube, Chicago, Ill., business manager Commercial Portrait Artists, American Federation of Labor.

Treasurer, Ernest Bohm, New York City, secretary Central Federated Union.

Sergeant at arms, Fred Lohn, Chicago, Ill., Leather Workers' International Union.

General counsel, ex-Congressman H. Robert Fowler, Harrisburg, Ill.

Now, mind you, this meeting in Washington where the declaration of the principles of the council were established was a wide-open, public meeting, anyone could attend the meeting who desired to do so. A committee was selected to meet the President of the United States and lay before him the purposes of the meeting and to inform him that we were organized for the purpose of aiding him in his efforts for peace. However, the President declined to meet us, giving as his reason that his time was so fully taken up with matters of a national character he did not have time to see us.

My activities as president of the council, with the exception of making a speech at Carnegie Hall and Madison Square Garden in New York and one or two others in Newark, N. J., were confined to Chicago and vicinity where Labor's National Peace Council headquarters were established, and consisted of about three or four weeks' effort directed to crystallize the sentiment in favor of peace, and also in favor of Government monopoly of the manufacture of munitions of war. In the latter part of July I resigned as president of Labor's National Peace Council and disconnected myself from the organization because my official associates, over my protest, decided to hold a meeting in Washington the latter part of July. I was opposed to this meeting because the President had refused to meet us and I could see nothing to be accomplished. It was too much like a dog barking at the moon, and therefore I declined to take further part in the activities of the council. My resignation was accepted August 1 and my successor elected. However, not desiring to put anything in the way of the council's activities for peace, I made no public declaration in regard to my resignation or my reasons for resigning.

I have been charged in the newspapers and by the indictment in New York, under the antitrust laws, with conspiring to interfere with interstate commerce in munitions of war. I never met Mr. Lamar, who has also been indicted, but once before this indictment and that was during the Senate investigations during the last Congress. During my connection with Labor's National Peace Council or since the European war I never saw, heard of, or directly or indirectly communicated with him until after the indictment. I never heard of Von Rintelen until his name was published in the newspapers in connection with this so-called conspiracy. To my knowledge during my connection with Labor's National Peace Council, or since then, for that matter, no money was ever received, directly or indirectly, from agents of any foreign Government. The question of strikes or interference with commerce was never even discussed or considered. However, I do not hesitate to say that if I had the power to stop that despicable traffic in death weapons, meant to destroy men who are friends of ours, and to widow their wives and orphan their children, I would exercise that power no matter if it meant a term of 10 years in jail. Their prayers and blessings and thankfulness would be richer benisons to one in jail than all the political honor that can come to a Member of Congress, of the Cabinet, or even a President.

There is no doubt in my mind that this indictment is a political conspiracy on the part of the war traffickers, whose influence is exerted through the administration in Washington, to destroy me politically, and especially my influence at this time in opposition to their propaganda to secure a large, unnecessary and criminal expenditure of the people's money under the name of preparedness, which means militarism, navalism, and war. Not only to destroy my influence in opposition to this pernicious propaganda, but to coerce and intimidate others who are earnestly striving to arouse the people against the destructive influences of such a damnable system. I might mention as a significant fact in this regard that other officers who directed the activities of Labor's National Peace Council in New York, the district in which I have been indicted, have not been indicted as coconspirators in this alleged plot to obstruct commerce.

This crowd that is behind this prosecution have attempted to bribe labor officials to give false testimony against some of those who have been indicted. Such methods are unworthy of any administration that lays claim to democracy. It was such methods that our forefathers spilled their blood and sacrificed their lives to abolish, and unless such practices are brought to an early termination the people, when they become awakened to the actual condition of affairs, will rise up in their power and relegate to the political scrap heap those who have acquiesced in such methods. This is the first time in my life that I have ever been indicted or charged with an offense against the law. However, I am not complaining about this personally, but because these methods have become a custom on the part of the system in their attacks upon representative labor men.

My mother was left a widow when I was but 10 years old, and at an early age I had to help support her and my sister. I have worked hard all my life, and have perhaps been somewhat handicapped by the lack of a school education. Whatever store of information I have has been secured in the school of experience and whatever progress I have made or success I have had has been by a hard, uphill pull. I take all these things as a matter of fact and am not seeking sympathy, but I do believe that every citizen of the United States is entitled to a square deal. These vile practices have become a custom with many of our Federal officials, resulting in destroying the constitutional and fundamental rights of a large number of American citizens, and unless this propaganda by indictment without sufficient grounds to justify same under the law is overthrown, then the liberties of which we boast under our Constitution and the fundamental principles of our Government have been lost.

I realize the resourcefulness of the crowd combined for the purpose of securing my conviction, which consists of unlimited wealth and the pernicious influence of the big daily war trust newspapers of the country, which by their methods strangle truth, outrage justice, and insult the intelligence of the American people. I also realize my limited resources compared with that combination of subtle influences, but it is my purpose to fight that crowd to the last ditch no matter what the result may be. If I can succeed even in part in overthrowing this bureaucratic usurpation of power by public officials, which results in destroying the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, I will feel, indeed, that I have rendered a service to my country and my people. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, while the pernicious propaganda of the war traffickers, through the war trust newspapers of the country, has undoubtedly poisoned the minds and clear thought of many of our public-spirited and conscientious citizens, among them labor leaders, I am glad to say that it has not been able to influence or sway the leading Chicago trade-unionists from their determination to stanchly support any movement that will advance and to sternly oppose any proposition that will hinder or interfere with the progress, welfare, and happiness of the great masses of the people, the wealth producers. And in this connection I take pleasure in here presenting a resolution adopted by the Chicago Federation of Labor, and ask unanimous consent to have same printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to print certain resolutions in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman intends to ask to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

REPORT OF EXECUTIVE BOARD OF THE CHICAGO FEDERATION OF LABOR ON "PREPAREDNESS," ADOPTED SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1916.

If we are to express the attitude of the labor movement toward the increase of military power, we must face the issue squarely and consider all questions concerned in relation to the workers. We must draw the line between "preparedness," as it might be defined by labor and the militarism which is the real desire of the commercial interests.

The program advocated by "big business" and the newspapers which it controls should be unqualifiedly opposed by organized labor. The kind of preparedness in which we believe would not result in the destruction, but in the protection, of human life and the products of labor. Our preparedness would mean the development of every man, woman, and child to the highest possible standard. Furthermore, it would develop the only true patriotism. A government which would give equal opportunity and justice to all would possess in the highest degree the love and loyalty of its citizens. The father who could look forward with courage and fortitude, the mother who could go about her daily tasks in peace and confidence in the future, the children assured of opportunity would love their country and protect it. Such people would have too high a sense of justice to attack wantonly any other people.

Throughout all the countries of the world to-day there is a struggle for the control of industrial organization. Upon one side are the great commercial interests, upon the other side the great organizations of labor. A study of the political governments of our day will prove that they are dominated by the powerful business organizations. Their problems are the problems of trade. For the protection of privilege, the development of colonies, spheres of influence, and commercial supremacy armies and navies are created and supported.

In the Chicago Herald, December 29, William L. Chenery says at the Clark University conference on war this month Rear Admiral Chadwick, United States Navy, said:

"Imperialism has had its worst and most injurious development in recent years, its essence being land grabbing and the establishing of spheres of influence. Navies and armies are the insurance for capital owned abroad by the leisure class of a nation. It is for them that empires and spheres of influence exist. The great war now raging is a culmination of efforts to maintain and extend these spheres. The time has come to call a halt."

Any plan for heavy armament, under present conditions, will mean the spending of billions, the building up of great ammunition trusts and other trusts which take their life out of the labor of the workers. It will mean the development of an oligarchy of powerful commercial forces which would dominate the Government and crush out forever the hope of democracy. The stronger the military power would become, the stronger would become the power of the commercial interests. Not only would they dominate the social and political life of the country but they would control the educational policy, teach their philosophy in the schools, subsidize the newspapers and all sources of information. Their power to do these things to-day is nothing to what it would be if a great Army and Navy backed them up.

But this is not the only danger. Warfare is becoming more and more a matter of mechanics and labor. Engineers, chemists, mechanics, trench diggers, and laborers are fighting the war in Europe. Military tactics include industrial organization. Every student of the fighting in Europe, every magazine article and lecture upon the subject emphasizes its importance in a modern war. Every plan for the development of military power includes a plan for industrial organization. Furthermore every plan looks toward some form of coercion, not only military conscription but industrial conscription which would bring the workers of the Nation under military control. The ideal of military leaders is a great organization of workers under control of the Army, disciplined, taught to respond and obey. These men would be ready for war if war were desired, and in times of peace would be occupied upon great industrial projects under the direct control of the army of a paternalistic government.

Public ownership of arms and munition factories, of the mines, forests, and natural resources which would be necessary to the supply of raw material, and of the railroads and steamships necessary to its transportation, would be the first step to take in any plan of preparedness which labor could indorse. Now is the time for labor to hold and strengthen its power over the organization of industry if the spirit of democracy is to be saved.

As a program for the support of organized labor we recommend the following:

First. Work for the passage of the Keating child-labor bill, which would prohibit the interstate transportation of the products of child labor.

Second. Endeavor to raise the age limit in child-labor and compulsory-education laws to 16 years.

Third. Support legislation abolishing strike-breaking detective agencies and private gunmen.

Fourth. Work for the Buchanan home-loan bill.

Fifth. Put the power of the Nation back of the home; pension mothers and protect children.

Sixth. Abolish the tenement system of life and work to secure a clean, healthful system of housing.

Seventh. Provide for outdoor physical training in connection with the public schools, to be continued during the summer vacation. This training should be instruction in the laws of health, woodcraft, and nature study, cooking, camping, first aid in case of accident or drowning, and all that goes to make boys and girls capable and independent. Working in groups would develop this power cooperate which is so essential in peace as well as war. To put guns in the hands of children for this work would be vicious; to imitate guns with sticks would be silly The schools should do all possible to develop keen, ready minds and healthy bodies. The cooperative instinct which would result in willing obedience for the best interests of all, proceeding from knowledge of what is best, is the ideal which should inspire this training.

Eighth. Organized labor should strive to obtain the fullest possible recognition by the Government for organizations of working people instituted for the purpose of improving wages and working conditions.

We recommend that organized labor be alive and awake to see that in any system of citizen soldiery the greatest possible freedom and democracy shall prevail; that the men shall be given education in civic affairs, physical training, and the fullest opportunity for promotion from the ranks; representation for labor upon whatever committees or commissions may be chosen to decide upon or control plans for military defense should be demanded.

Ninth. Any military system should be democratically officered and controlled by heads directly responsible to the citizens of the land.

Tenth. We should oppose any increase of the standing Army.

The danger to the American workingman from foreign countries is not so much the danger of an attack by their Governments; the real danger to the workers comes from the hordes of helpless, underfed, foreign emigrants which are brought into this country every year by the great manufacturing interests which want cheap labor. Any plan for the increase of the Army and Navy would make this danger more acute. If the American workers are drawn into the Army and Navy and the industrial plants which would be necessary to its support, a demand for more labor power would make an excuse for bringing in low-paid workers who would undermine the standard of living and make every real problem of labor more acute. The problems of labor are the shortening of the work hours, the increase of wages, the betterment of conditions, stronger organization, and constant development of greater power in the political field. An increased Army and Navy would not solve a single difficulty that labor has to face.

Preparedness is needed in the United States, but it must be a preparedness which is based upon physical fitness. Patriotism is needed, but it must be a patriotism which is based upon love of country; and only a country which guarantees liberty and opportunity will be loved.

We feel that the labor movement of Chicago, situated as we are in the very center of America, feeling the life of both the East and West, should help to hold the balance, to strike the average to counteract the hysteria and speak for the international spirit of labor, which we hope will revive when the guns of Europe have been stilled and we are able to start to build upon the ruins a better civilization.

Respectfully submitted.

CHICAGO FEDERATION OF LABOR,
JOHN FITZPATRICK, President.
E. N. NOCKELS, Secretary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POU and Mr. COX rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Carolina rise?

Mr. POU. To make a motion under the rule that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. COX. For the purpose of offering an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. A preferential motion?

Mr. COX. Yes. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, under the rules this is one of the Fridays that are set apart by the House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The Committee on Claims has been doing diligent work, and I think has some fifty-odd bills on the Private Calendar. The House may as well understand right here and now that if we ever expect to consider these bills in the usual, parliamentary way, the House had better commence at this time. I have made, I think, the proper motion under the rules. I do not think the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] is in order; that is to say, I do not think it is a preferential motion under the rule, but it has been construed to be preferential, and for my part I most respectfully submit. We have these bills constantly accumulating, and by the next Friday that comes around, when it will be in order to consider them, we will probably have 50 more. The result would be that the only consideration these bills could have would probably be upon some night set apart for their consideration by unanimous consent. The only way you are going to get an opportunity to have your bills considered in the usual way is by voting down the preferential motion made by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Why could not all of these little matters be bundled together in an omnibus bill and then have it brought in, so that we can have a fair chance to consider them? If they come up in the way suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina, they are unanimous-consent propositions.

Mr. POU. If they were all "bundled together," as the gentleman says, into an omnibus bill, it would probably take just as long to consider that bill as 't will to consider them separately. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am merely calling the attention of the House to the fact that this is early in the session; that there is no reason why this day should be taken away from the Committee on Claims. Under the rule, it belongs to the Committee on Claims. The rule provides that every alternate Friday, except the second and the fourth, shall be set apart by the House for the consideration of private business. Why, when there is no urgency, as there certainly is not at this time, should that rule be set aside for the consideration of an appropriation bill? This is early in the session. If the matter is put off, later on there will be no opportunity to consider private bills at all; so it is up to the House now to decide whether it proposes to give that consideration to the Private Calendar which the rule provides or set aside the day for the consideration of an appropriation bill upon which there has been long and, possibly, unnecessary debate.

Of course, this is an important measure. It is, indeed, one of the greatest bills the House will be called upon to consider; but I will remind the House of this fact: Only once during the last five years, as I recollect, have bills from the Committee on Claims been considered in the usual way. I believe we did get a part of one day. The question is, shall the rule of unanimous consent be always applied to the Committee on Claims, which is trying to do faithful work, or shall we have the day the rule says we shall have?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I have no criticism to make of the Committee on Claims. It is doing splendid work, and in its desire to get these bills before the House to-day I commend it; but it is certainly apparent to every Member of the House that Congress has never been so jammed before as it is now; and this is but the beginning. If we do not get some of these appropriation bills through the House and over to the Senate, we will be here next fall until the snow flies. There is no question on earth about that. I hope that the motion which I made that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill will prevail. I have not made it for the purpose of cutting out the Committee on Claims, but for the sole purpose of expediting business.

Mr. POU. If it is not for the purpose of cutting out the Committee on Claims, for what other purpose can it be?

Mr. COX. The appropriation bills, as the gentleman knows, must pass; they must become law; and while we would like to see the private bills pass, yet they are not absolutely essential.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the preferential motion made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 86.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. We should transact public business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 201, answered "present" 1, not voting 94, as follows:

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar in order for to-day, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

ELLIS P. GARTON, ADMINISTRATOR.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Private Calendar.

The first bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7502) for the relief of Ellis P. Garton, administrator of the estate of H. B. Garton, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to rehear, retry, determine, and finally adjudicate the claim of Ellis P. Garton, administrator of the estate of H. B. Garton, deceased, No. 70075, Indian depredations, in the Court of Claims, and to award judgment therein as fully and completely as if the petition had not been dismissed. Full jurisdiction and power is hereby given to the Court of Claims to rehear and retry said claim upon all evidence that has been or may be presented upon a hearing in said case.

The CHAIRMAN. What will be done with the bill, gentlemen?

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MANN. I suppose somebody will explain the bill.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill for the purpose of reopening a case that has been tried before the Court of Claims. The case depended upon the fixing of a date, and the Court of Claims in its original hearing was not satisfied that the evidence was sufficient to determine that the court had jurisdiction, and without passing upon the merits of the case it was dismissed for want of proof that it came within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims. Subsequently evidence was discovered that was not available at that time, that fixes the date of the occurrence clearly within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and under a precedent of a like character we have brought this bill into Congress to ask that we may be allowed to show that the Court of Claims has jurisdiction of the case and then that it may determine the case on its merits.

This is not a case asking for the appropriation of any money, and it was before Congress at the last session and was passed after quite a full discussion, against the objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. However, it was not reached for a hearing and consideration by the Senate, and has been again unanimously reported favorably by the Committee on Claims.

I think that is all I desire to say at this time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] desires to address the House for 15 minutes, and I yield to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 15 minutes.

SHIPMENT OF CONDENSED MILK TO THE BABIES AND INFANTS OF THE CENTRAL POWERS.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, some time ago I introduced a resolution which requested the State Department to take up with the allied powers the question of allowing shipments of condensed milk to the babies and infants of Germany, Austria, and their allies. I would like to address the House for a little while on this subject. In the very beginning I want to dispel any belief that I am actuated by motives pro-German. I am an American from way back. I see American visions and I dream American dreams, and any actions that I take are dedicated to America. As far as the outcome of the European conflict is concerned, I am a neutral. The very fact that I take the time of the House to plead for babies in danger shows that I am prohumanitarian in my motive and pro-American, for the two terms are one and the same thing. I believe that from the birth of this Nation until now humanity has been an ever-increasing watchword of our people. To-day it is our pride, and as I speak I can see clearly through the departed days the figures of our teachers—Washington, Lincoln, Webster, McKinley, and others—and know that I have their approval when I say—

War can not be made by any country against the helpless babies and infants of an enemy country.

If civilization has broken down all over the world and we have given up the fight, then let us sit idly by and listen without feeling to the thin cry of thousands of starving infants on the other side, but if America is, indeed, the land in which civilization and humanity have built their capital, then let us sound the trumpet of justice against the walls of those who would wreak vengeance upon the helpless.

From the London Times of December 31, 1915, I got the wording of a telegram sent by our State Department to the American ambassadors in London and Paris on December 30, 1915:

Ascertain and report promptly whether British (French) Government will permit the transportation of milk from this country to Germany and Austria, to be distributed to babies in these countries under the direction of the American Red Cross.

On February 17, 1916, I ascertained from the State Department that such a message had been sent. I also ascertained that only about three weeks ago France had answered, presumably for the allies, that owing to military reasons such shipments would not be permitted. The London Times of above date goes on to comment:

If we refuse leave, von Mach's propaganda will have scored a distinct triumph.

The reference to von Mach's propaganda is, of course, to an effort by the citizens' committee for food shipments, of which Dr. Edmund von Mach is executive chairman, to permit the shipping of condensed milk to the babies of the central powers. Evidently the Times when it made the assertion that stands above did so because it realized that the whole question of a milk supply for the babies abroad is a question of humanity and not of law.

I do not believe that anyone in the House will say that the shipping of condensed milk to babies in need of food is not a question of humanity, and as such rises above any law standing in the way—if we can conceive of any law contrary to humanity. And in the present instance I say, Mr. Chairman, there is no exception. There is no law behind which refuge can be taken against the powerful eye of humanity. The allies in their blockade against the shipping of milk to babies and infants in Germany, Austria, and their allies are acting contrary to the established doctrines of international law. I do not care to take up time in lengthy dissertation on this subject, for it is a big one and has often been touched upon by gentlemen in the House and the Senate far better informed than I. But it would not be out of place to recall a few great words which we had hoped had for all time established the dictates of justice in the matter of blockades. Back in 1799 Sir Walter Scott said:

I take the modern-established rule to be this, that they (the provisions) are not contraband, but may become so under circumstances arising out of the war, or the conditions of the parties engaged in it—

And, again, he says:

The most important distinction is whether articles were intended for the ordinary use of life or whether they were going with a highly probable destination to military use.

Lord Granville, in his dispatch of February 27, 1885, said:

Her Majesty's Government can not admit that, consistently with the law and practice of nations and with the rights of neutrals, provisions in general can be treated as contraband of war. Her Majesty's Government does not contest that under particular circumstances may acquire that character, as, for instance, if they should be consigned direct to the fleet of a belligerent or to a port where such a fleet should be lying, and facts should exist raising the presumption that they were about to be employed in victualing the fleet of the enemy. In such cases it is not denied that the belligerent would be entitled to seize the provisions as a contraband of war on the ground that they would enable warlike operations to be carried on. But Her Majesty's Government can not admit that if such provisions were consigned to the port of a belligerent (even though it should be a port of naval equipment), they could, therefore, be necessarily regarded as a contraband of war. In view of Her Majesty's Government the test appears to be whether there are circumstances relative to any particular cargo, or its destination, to displace the presumption that articles of this kind are intended for the ordinary use of life, and to show prima facie, at all events, that they are destined for military use.

There may be innumerable cases which we can recall where circumstances rising out of the wars of nations have in the eyes of the people of a waring nation necessitated some divergence from the recognized rules of international law, but history does not recount a single case where a nation has with the consent of its people diverged so far from the path of civilized warfare as to declare war upon the helpless infants of another nation. True, we have the children's crusade in the dim and cruel Middle Ages, but in that terrible case the war was against older children who had gone forth to do battle on their own volition. I say to you that if any nation desires to justify itself in warring upon babies it must look to other sources than humanity and law. [Applause.]

If England should attempt in the face of everything to justify her milk blockade on the grounds of imperative necessity, we have evidence which still would rob her of this defense. Judge Lindsey, the well-known and honored jurist, in a cabled interview is cited as saying:

England can not starve out the German people. Her starvation policy is not having, and has no prospect of having, such an effect on the adult population as to justify it on the grounds of military advantage or effect. That is my firm opinion after what I have seen in some weeks in Germany.

England by her illegal stopping of noncontraband in contravention of international law will have a really serious effect on one class, and that is a class which appeals to every human heart, namely, the babies.

England's policy may mean death or a life without health to thousands of German babies. There's one thing every baby needs and must have, and for which science has found no adequate substitute—that's milk. * * * Every time England stops shipments of milk she is striking a blow at the German babies. No one claims that they are a party to this war.

Speaking of visits paid to the markets of Berlin, Judge Lindsey says:

I heard but one complaint everywhere—that was of the shortage of butter and the inability to obtain sufficient milk for babies and children.

And later he says:

If France and England endeavor to stop such shipments, let them justify it before the world and history. I am taking no sides in this war one way or another, but I am for saving the babies of all countries. * * * The babies of England, France, and Italy have the world to draw upon. The babies of Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Poland are cut off from relief. They have the same right to receive help as the others.

What Judge Lindsey is quoted as saying I say and every sane man must say. I firmly believe that the peoples of the allied powers would say the same thing if the truths were allowed to come before them. I say that I believe the people of the allied powers can not sanction a blockade established to kill thousands of babies. My faith in human nature is far too firm, even in these days of startling revelations, to believe anything else. There are too many fathers, too many mothers, among the allied nations who know the sacredness of a trust held inviolate at all times and all places, even in those dark places where the light of civilization has not penetrated.

Regarding actual conditions in Germany I have some facts to present. We have already seen how Judge Lindsey's cabled interview in the papers of February 8, 1916, portrays conditions as seen by a keen American observer. Prof. C. W. Larson, of Pennsylvania State College, who is also secretary of the Official Dairy Instructors' Association, submits a scientific report on the milk conditions of Germany which reveals them as a professional dairyman knows they must be. I shall ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including this able report of Prof. Larson. This report was submitted to President Wilson at the White House on January 24, 1916, by the executive chairman of the citizens' committee for food shipments. I shall also request that I be permitted to include in my extended remarks certain other data bearing on the subject of my address.

I believe that it is fair to say that there are millions of helpless babies in Germany and Austria-Hungary facing perhaps the greatest milk shortage in history. What can we do about it?

We, as the representatives of the people of America, can in the name of humanity request the State Department to take up again with the Governments of France and England the question of permitting unhampered transit of condensed milk to the babies and infants of Germany, Austria-Hungary, and their allies. The request has already been made to the State Department by the National American Red Cross in behalf of the citizens' committee for food shipments. I believe that our humane President and his State Department are anxious to do all they can to help the infants of the stricken countries across the seas. If President Wilson felt that he were sure of the approval of Congress I believe he would take the matter up in a most convincing way. I furthermore believe that if the situation were clearly presented to the peoples of the allied nations that it would tend to take the whole question out of the sphere of any international wrangle and put it on the high plane of human kindness. What a blessed change it would be to the people of the warring countries if they could but catch the impassionate voice of humanity speaking of its most precious trust after these years of hate and passion.

Mr. Chairman, I am positive that if reason can for a moment gain a foothold that a plan can be submitted which will clear the situation for the babies. America could transport condensed milk to the infants of the central powers and a distribution to the babies could be made through the medium of the splendid American Red Cross or even through a special medium under American supervision. It is ridiculous to contend otherwise. Let us insist that the State Department make a thorough inquiry into the conditions herein mentioned and submit in the strongest way possible a solution of the problem, and let us assure the President that we are behind him in what he may do in the name of justice and humanity. Then, Mr. Speaker, we shall have done our part and crowned our campaign for civilization, and in years to come we shall not see the vision of countless dead infants and a host of sickly, unhappy children dragging their way to an early and welcome grave. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including the report of Dr. Larson upon the milk situation in Germany and Austria-Hungary.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chairs hears none.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes of his time.

Following is the report referred to:

THE MILK SITUATION IN GERMANY AND AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

[By C. W. Larson.]

There is undoubtedly a great shortage of milk in Germany and Austria-Hungary. This conclusion is based upon the study of the conditions in those countries before the war, together with conditions known to exist now, and the necessary results that follow from these conditions.

The reasons for this conclusion are:

First. Germany and Austria-Hungary are not dairy countries in times of peace: they do not produce enough of the dairy products for their own needs.

Second. The amount of milk consumed by the adult in Germany is a very small amount. The average annual consumption is only about 70 quarts per year.

Third. Only small quantities of the manufactured dairy products are consumed, and a large percentage of these is imported. There is, therefore, not much milk from this source that can now be utilized for the babies.

Fourth. Because of the location of the dairies where the milk for manufactured products is produced, this milk can not be transported to the consumer in time to make it fit for baby food.

Fifth. Denmark, which has in the past supplied considerable of the dairy products to Germany, has had her output greatly decreased by being unable to secure concentrated feeds that she has imported in the past.

Sixth. Germany and Austria-Hungary depended largely upon imported feeds for their cows; at least one-half of the production of the cows was obtained from such feeds as cottonseed meal, oil cake, and other protein products that before the war were imported by millions of tons from the United States, Russia, and Egypt, in about equal quantities from the three countries.

The following are the imports and exports to and from Germany for the year 1913:

Fresh milk and skimmed milk.

IMPORTS.	Tons.
Denmark	32,810
France	5,374
Austria-Hungary (border exports and imports)	5,081
Switzerland	16,210

Austria-Hungary (border exports and imports)	11,573

Cream.

IMPORTS.
Denmark	35,076
Russia	2,252
Sweden	6,998
EXPORT.
To all countries	25

Butter and butter fat.

IMPORTS.
Denmark	2,155
Netherlands	18,455
Austria	954
Russia	29,922
Finland	2,165
Sweden	313
EXPORT.
To all countries	273

Hard cheese.

IMPORTS.
Italy	24,259
Netherlands	16,923
Switzerland	6,334
EXPORT.
To all countries	129

Soft cheese.

IMPORTS.
France	1,494
Total	2,006
EXPORT.
To all countries	598

There was also some condensed milk imported.

A survey made of the food consumption of the working classes of German towns by the British Board of Trade and based upon 5,046 weekly budgets show that the average yearly consumption of milk was about 70 quarts. This shows how small a quantity must have been consumed by the adults; and when it is remembered that 365 quarts are required per year per child, the amount actually consumed under normal conditions only provides for 1 quart for every fifth person. The annual per capita consumption in New York City is over 120 quarts, and in Boston over 200 quarts. Obviously the cows can not now have the proper care, and on account of lack of feed this small production must be still further decreasing. The following tables show the amount of imports of two of the concentrates so necessary in feeding their cows:

Imports of cotton seed, 1913.	Tons.
Egypt	219,797
United States	10,062
EXPORT.
Total	810

Imports of oil cake and oil-cake meal.

Russia	230,418
United States of America	208,446
Total of other countries	756,772

In the study referred to and made by the British Board of Trade the average consumption of butter was only about 14 pounds in the working districts, and about 6 pounds of cheese. Inasmuch as considerable of this is imported, and since the butter and cheese were made in outlying districts, not accessible to shipments by railroad, the converting of this milk into baby milk is not of very great consequence in relieving the situation.

Because, therefore, of the limited quantities available in times of peace, and because of the cutting off of imports of milk and milk products, and because of the impossibility of getting protein feed, not taking into account the number of cattle that have probably been slaughtered and the probable decrease in efficiency of the management of the herds, there must undoubtedly be an inadequate supply; and the babies and invalids will suffer unless milk is supplied from some outside source.

Respectfully submitted.

C. W. LARSON.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE PROBABLE MILK SITUATION IN GERMANY.

[By Prof. C. W. Larson.]

The following calculations are based upon known conditions before the war, together with the probable results of the war. It is assumed that there has been no decrease in the number of cows. As a matter of fact, however, a cow's milking period is only about six years, and on account of lack of proper foods imported heretofore, and the killing of some of the cows, the production has, no doubt, decreased materially. There were also a great many cows imported during the years previous to the war.

The items 2, 12, and 19 are based on the fact that Germany depended upon imported proteins, such as cotton seed, oil cake, etc., for dairy cows. This supply is cut off now. Protein feeds are not only necessary to production but also stimulate production. Without such feeds not over one-half the normal flow of milk can be expected.

The items 3, 13, and 20 could be reduced to some extent by taking hay intended for horses and beef cattle, and the efficiency of management increased some to meet the demand for milk for babies. If this loss were reduced, the situation would be relieved to some extent. Improving efficiency will, however, take time.

The items 11 and 21 include milk not available for babies, because:

(a) Some milk must be kept for young stock in order that herds may be kept up. The skimmed milk was available when butter was made.

(b) Much milk used for butter making is not of sufficiently good quality to be used for babies. Not half the milk produced in the United States for butter is good enough for babies. It requires years to teach producers of milk for butter the methods necessary for milk for infants.

(c) Butter can be shipped long distances; milk can not. Much butter is produced in districts not accessible to frequent shipment.

The total need as shown in item 24 is computed as follows:

According to the last census the percentage of children in Germany under 5 years of age was 13.1 per cent of the population. The total of these between 4 and 5 years was 11.6 per cent of all children below 5. Therefore:

70,000,000×13.1%=9,170,000 under 5 years.
9,170,000×11.6%=1,063,720 between 4 and 5 years.

Number under 4 years of age=8,106,280.

Figuring on the basis of 1 quart per day per child, there would be required each year 8,106,280×365=2,958,792,200.

It is desirable often to feed more than 1 quart per day, but in an emergency other foods could be used to some extent.

The equivalent of butter was computed on a basis of 20 pounds of milk per pound of butter. The equivalent of cheese was computed on a basis of 10 pounds of milk per pound of cheese.

As a check on the above figures the following is suggested:

If all of the milk produced in the country was used for the babies, none of it unfit and none given to sustain the calves which are to make the future herds, there would be the following amounts:

	Quarts.
From item 1	4,900,000,000
From item 9	8,370,000,000
From item 18	1,560,000,000
Total	14,830,000,000

There were about 10,000,000 dairy cows in Germany before the war, and if the average production was equal to the average of the United States, which is 1,500 quarts per cow, there should be produced about 15,000,000,000 quarts.

[The daily consumption of milk in New York City is over 2,000,000 quarts.]

I also append herewith certain data as to the milk shortage before referred to:

Official recognition of the milk shortage is contained in the official North German Gazette, under dates of October 12 and November 6, 13, 17, 19, 25, and 28, 1915. The summary of these articles is as follows:

October 12, 1915: In Berlin it is estimated that there is sufficient milk to supply children only up to 4 years of age. In ordinary times milk supplied to children up to 9 years of age and to invalids is half of all the milk used.

November 6, 1915: Milk tickets are to be issued in Templehof for children up to 1 year, 1 quart (this is only three-quarters of the average allowance for 1-year-old babies in American nurseries); for children 1 to 4 years, three-fourths quart; and for children 4 to 14 years, 1 pint.

November 13, 1915: Milk tickets are being issued in Schoeneberg, but only to parents of children born since 1902.

November 17, 1915: In Stegelitz milk tickets are being issued for children and invalids.

November 19, 1915: The announcement from Strassburg reads that milk tickets are being issued. Women about to become mothers will receive during the last three months of their pregnancy the same amount as children under two years of age.

November 25, 1915: In Wattenscheid a census will be taken of all the families who should receive milk.

November 28, 1915: A cabinet order issued in Vienna regulates the consumption of milk, in an attempt to save the lives of babies, nursing mothers, and invalids in Austria-Hungary.

American confirmation of the milk shortage is found in the article by Gustav C. Roeder, in the New York World of January 3, 1916, page 4: "There is a considerable shortage of certain articles of food, meats principally, all fats, butter and milk." And in the dispatches from Berlin, via London, printed in the New York newspapers of Wednesday, January 5, 1916, to the effect that cow's milk is so short that the people of Berlin have been forced to rely largely on goat's milk.

One of the few letters, vividly portraying the milk famine in Upper Silesia, that has slipped past the German censorship reads:

"For Heaven's sake have pity on us and send us milk. My little boy is 8 months old—he is but a skeleton—and I have no food for him. How can he survive? The two older children are trying to comfort me, saying, 'Mother dear, we'll bear it if only God will keep you and the little brother and our dear father.'"

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, how much time does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] desire?

Mr. TOWNER. If you will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] first, then I will follow his objection.

Mr. POU. Whatever time the gentleman desires, if I have it, I will yield to him.

Mr. MANN. I do not ask the gentleman to yield me any time. I judge he might prefer to reserve his time. He is at liberty to do as he pleases about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] reserve the balance of his time?

Mr. POU. I do, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The question of the allowance of claims caused by Indian depredations has been a question which has been before the country from its origin.

Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have somebody here, and I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and two gentleman are present, a quorum. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying the question of claims for Indian depredations has been before the country always, and in the early days there was provision made for the payment of certain claims, and then for many years there was no provision at all made by the Government for the payment of claims to people who were killed or had their property taken or destroyed by the Indians, the theory of the Government at that time being that the Indians on the frontier were likely at any time to be involved in trouble with the settlers, and that the Government was not in a position to protect settlers who advanced into the Indian country, from danger, and that settlers who went there took their chances.

Some years ago, not very many years ago, Congress passed a law providing that the Court of Claims might hear and determine claims in Indian depredation cases where the Indians were at amity with the United States, it being the purpose of the Government that where an Indian tribe was on the warpath, and at war, practically, with our Government, we did not guarantee people who went into that country for the purpose of making large gains out of the sale of goods that we would pay the damage if the Indians should catch them. We have had a contest over that matter for many years in the House, as to whether Congress would provide for the payment of claims where the Indians were at war. There was in these Indian depredation cases, thousands of which were filed in the Court of Claims, large numbers which were dismissed because the Indians were at war. There were large numbers dismissed because it was ascertained that many of the men who had claims, and had gone into the frontier country, were, in fact, foreigners, and never had been naturalized, although they treated and considered themselves as citizens.

In the last Congress we passed a law removing the disability of citizenship, so that a man who had a claim in one of these Indian depredation cases, and it turned out he could not prove American citizenship, would still be entitled to prosecute his claim. That law was passed because there were numerous instances of men who held high office, who had voted for years, who had supposed they were American citizens, but where it turned out they had not complied with the law, or that something was the trouble so that they were not citizens; and hence their claims were dismissed. We had a sort of an understanding in the House when that bill was passed that we would not pass a law removing the requirement of amity. This Committee on Claims has recently had before it a bill introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER] for the relief of Cyrus F. Goddard, which bill proposes to remove the disability or effect of amity. The Committee on Claims reported the bill adversely, and I think very properly, indeed. Now, my friend from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] differentiates the pending bill by saying this does not remove the defect of amity. Theoretically, that is true, but practically it does remove the question of amity.

Let us see what the facts are in this case. This bill is for the relief of Ellis P. Garton, administrator of the estate of H. B. Garton. H. B. Garton years ago was a citizen of Iowa, and in 1865 made up a train of wagons and goods to go out to the city of Denver. While, so far as I am informed, there is no evidence to show whether he was taking these goods out to look at or to sell, I think the presumption is quite strong that he was going out there for the purpose of taking the goods out to sell at a good, high profit.

There was great trouble across the Plains in those days. There were wars and other wars, Indian outbreaks, and Mr. Garton took his chances on getting through. If he got through, he made great gains. Unfortunately, he did not get through and paid the penalty—loss of his life. He knew there was trouble. He stopped in Nebraska and put his wagons into a large train of wagons numbering about 100. As the report says, this was done for mutual protection, as the Sioux Indians were depredating in that section at that time. I read from the report of the committee in this case:

> This was done for mutual protection, as the Sioux Indians were depredating in that section at that time.

Shortly after leaving the station where these wagons were combined in one train, the train was attacked by a band of Sioux Indians, and the rear wagons of the train, including those of Mr. Garton, were cut off. He and his son and some others were killed, the animals were carried away by the Indians, and the wagons and their contents were burned and destroyed.

The administrator of Mr. Garton's estate brought a case in the Court of Claims and took testimony. According to the testimony of some of the witnesses this attack of the Indians occurred on the 28th day of October, 1865. Some of the witnesses thought the attack occurred about the 24th or the 25th of October, 1865. The report says the court had decided "that the Sioux Indians, as a tribe, had been hostile to the United States from some time in the late summer of 1864 up to the 28th of October, 1865," and that on the latter date—the 28th of October, 1865—the last of the bands of the Sioux Tribe of Indians had signed a treaty of peace with the United States, and that "on that day the status of amity between the Sioux Tribe of Indians and the United States was resumed."

That may be legally correct. I do not know. But Mr. Garton knew they were not at amity. Whatever the court may decide as to when the treaty of peace was entered into, he knew when he entered into this train, as all the other men who entered the train knew, that they were liable to attack from those Indians, who were on the warpath, and that they were not at peace and amity with the United States. The court held that it had no jurisdiction, because when the attack occurred the United States was not in amity with the Indians.

It is stated now that there have been recently discovered in the city of Denver contemporaneous publications which show that the correct date of the killing and the attack and destruction of the property was October 28, 1865. The evidence before did not clearly indicate that it was October 28. If the attack was made on October 27, there would be no question; Mr. Garton is not entitled to any claim under the law. If it was made on October 28 and we then had a treaty of peace, it is a question whether, technically and legally, he can prosecute his claim in the Court of Claims and obtain a judgment. But the fact remains that he knew that the Indians were not in amity with the United States.

There are millions of dollars of these claims which have been dismissed in the Court of Claims and millions of dollars of other claims which have not yet been brought in the Court of Claims which would be allowed if we remove the question of amity.

Now, of course, I understand very well that among the distinguished and able Members of this great legislative body who choose in the middle of a session of Congress to dispense with the consideration of the greatest appropriation bill which comes before any legislative body in the world, in order to take up little Private Calendar claims, some of which involve the enormous sum of $7 [laughter], it is not to be expected that a House that would do that would give any consideration to the merits of a proposition that comes before it. [Laughter.] And I do not anticipate that anything I can say will have any immediate effect upon the body here now. But I think it is my duty to oppose some of these claims which have managed to creep through the Committee on Claims, usually quite careful under the chairmanship of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], in the hope that it may continue to make the committee somewhat careful about the claims which it reports.

This claim has no more merit in it than the claims of thousands of other men, involving many millions of dollars, who can not get into court, either, without special legislation. Now, it is proposed to pass a special private bill and let this man go back into the court where he was once, where he had his chance, where the case was tried, because he imagines he can find—or maybe it is not imagination; I do not know, because the report is not very definite on the subject—some new evidence that would technically allow his claim, but not on the merit of the claim would it be allowed.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the objections of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the passage of this bill are directed more, as I think Members must be able clearly to see, to all of this class of claims than to this particular claim. I venture to say, Mr. Chairman, that what is asked in this bill presented to any court of the United States would be granted unhesitatingly upon a showing of the same facts that are shown here.

In 1891 Congress passed a bill under which those who had claims for the destruction of property on account of certain Indian depredations that were committed when the tribes were at amity with the United States were paid for, or would be paid for, by the Government. The reason of that was not far to seek. The gentleman from Illinois pictures Mr. Garton and the other pioneers who settled those Western States as a mercenary lot of adventurers, taking a lot of property out there to sell, hoping to reap a large profit by the transaction. But the facts in this case, as in most of these cases, are that these pioneers constituted the advance guard of the civilization of the Western World. They were the men who built up the States of Illinois and Iowa and all the Western States until you reach the Pacific. This man was not taking property out there to sell at a profit. He went out there with his wagons and horses and cattle and his farming machinery in order to settle there and make for himself a home and help build up the country. That was the motive that actuated Mr. Garton. Congress, in passing this bill, limited it—very properly, I think—to those who filed their claims within three years. This claim was filed within three years. It was necessary first, however, as a jurisdictional fact, for the Court of Claims to be shown affirmatively that the United States was at amity with the tribe when the depredation was committed.

The claimant in this case failed to show to the satisfaction of the Court of Claims that the massacre occurred on a date when the United States was at amity with the Indian tribe. There was a divergence of testimony and of opinion as to the date. It was, of course, difficult to determine it absolutely, and for that reason the Court of Claims dismissed the claim because of a want of this requisite jurisdictional showing. Subsequently, however, and entirely accidentally, upon the investigation of another case, it was discovered that the date could and would be satisfactorily shown, because in the contemporary papers published at the time in Denver, a file of which was obtainable in the public library of Denver, it appeared that this depredation in which Mr. Garton and his family lost their lives, and in which his property was destroyed, occurred at a date which had been officially determined as a time when the United States was at amity with this particular Indian tribe; and for this reason, if that fact is shown, then the jurisdictional fact necessary will be determined, and the claimant may have an opportunity of being heard and proving his case if he can do so. Precedents of this kind have been established already, so that we are not asking for anything new. We are asking only that we be allowed to show, if we can, by this newly discovered evidence, that this man is entitled to a hearing before the Court of Claims as to the justice of his cause. That is all there is of it. I think the Committee on Claims properly reported this bill favorably before, and reported it unanimously. I think they have again reported it properly, with a unanimously favorable recommendation. In the last Congress, against the objections that were then urged by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], ably as he always does, and effectively as he always does, the House, nevertheless, by a very large majority passed the bill, but unfortunately it failed in the Senate. I sincerely hope the theoretical objections that have been urged by my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] against this class of claims will not avail against those who bring themselves squarely within the terms of a law passed by Congress, and I judge that gentlemen on the floor of the House will not be unduly influenced by the fact that the Committee on Claims have been able, by such a definite majority of the House, to hold their right, which is given them under the rule, not to be supplanted when the time comes for the consideration of this class of bills.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] states that Mr. Garton went on this trip as a settler, and, if he states that from his own knowledge, of course I am willing to accept it. But that is not the report of the committee.

Mr. TOWNER. The evidence before the committee very clearly shows that.

Mr. MANN. This is what the report of the committee says:

H. B. Garton was a citizen of Wayne County, Iowa, and a man of influence and standing. In the summer of 1865 he made up a train of wagons, drawn by mules, horses, and oxen, and loaded the same for the city of Denver.

Now, if there were any settlers who went out West under conditions of that kind, I miss my guess. I have seen, in my early boyhood days, thousands and thousands of settlers on their way to the West. A settler did not take a train of wagons, some of which were drawn by mules, some of which were drawn by horses, some of which were drawn by oxen. In the main he was very lucky if he had two wagons. Most of them had only one. It is perfectly plain that, if the report of the committee is correct, Mr. Garton loaded these wagons with goods and went out there on a speculation, not as a settler. He was a citizen of influence and standing in Wayne County, Iowa. He was not going as a homesteader. He was not a miner going out to Denver; he was not going out to seek silver or soil. He was going out to sell goods, a laudable enterprise. Many people found it profitable. Unfortunately he did not.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 42, noes 17.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twelve Members present, a quorum.

Accordingly the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ADMINISTRATOR OF WILLIAM J. LANDRAM, DECEASED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1584) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Louis Landram, administrator of William J. Landram, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in accordance with the findings of the Court of Claims, the sum of $5,346.29, to be accepted in full of all claims against the Government, to Louis Landram, administrator of William J. Landram, deceased.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, this is a claim of a little over $5,000, due to the estate of Gen. William J. Landram, a veteran of the Mexican War and a veteran of the Civil War. The claim has been examined from every angle and approved by the Court of Claims. A claim similar to this, and of which this forms an integral part, has been sanctioned, approved, and adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States. I undertake to say that if ever there was a claim that came clean-handed into this House, this is that claim.

The report of the committee shows that by the act of July 10, 1868, collectors and assessors were allowed commissions of one-half of 1 per cent on stamps placed on packages of distilled spirits. From 1873 to 1885 Col. William J. Landram was the collector of internal revenue of the eighth internal-revenue district of Kentucky. Under that law he was entitled, as the collector and assessor of distilled spirits in that district, to one-half of 1 per cent on the face value of the stamps placed on packages of distilled spirits. That was due him by way of compensation. By the act of December 4, 1872, the office of assessor was abolished. Bear in mind now that he first served in the capacity of collector and assessor of internal revenue. The office of assessor was abolished, which left him the collector of internal revenue. Under that act all of the above commissions were given to collectors, but the compensation of each collector was limited to $4,500. Landram applied for his commission to the Internal-Revenue Office, but the office refused to pay him. He thereupon instituted a suit in the Court of Claims, whose decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, allowing him the commissions claimed for the years 1880 to 1884, inclusive.

The present claim is for the commissions for the years 1874 to 1879, inclusive, which were not included in the suit brought in the Court of Claims on account of the oversight of one of Mr. Landram's attorneys.

The present contention is that Mr. Landram's estate is as much entitled to the commissions for the period from 1874 to 1879 as he was to those from 1880 to 1884, because all of the facts connected with the present claim and all the questions of law are identical with those decided in the Court of Claims and upheld by the United States Supreme Court in the case already referred to.

The claim for the commissions for the years 1874 to 1879, inclusive, was made as soon as the error was discovered in the form of H. R. 1614, Fifty-second Congress, first session, which was favorably reported by the Committee on Claims, but did not reach a vote in the Senate; and was next embraced in the Senate bill 3319, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, and which bill on the 28th of April, 1902, was referred to the Court of Claims after proceedings in conformity to the provisions of the so-called Tucker Act.

The Court of Claims, in Senate Document No. 14, Fifty-eighth Congress, promptly found that the claimant was entitled to recover, in addition to the amount already recovered, $5,346.28, the same amount the Committee on Claims in the House had reported as justly due him, and his contention, which had been upheld in every particular by the Supreme Court of the United States for the years adjudicated.

Now, I have read this report to show the fact that ever since the Supreme Court of the United States adjudicated the claim there has been a bona fide effort on the part of the Gen. Landram estate to collect this debt, which is just, due, and unpaid. He was a man who fought for his country in the Mexican War, and, as a general, fought for his country in the Civil War. To you men over here I occupy the position of a son of a southern man advocating that justice be done to an old Civil War veteran who has done his full measure of duty for this Republic.

My father was a Mexican soldier, and I expect that he stood shoulder to shoulder with Gen. Landram in the Mexican War, and as his son I stand here and plead that justice be done to this old Mexican veteran. Will it be said of this body that a man who has rendered the conspicuous service that Gen. Landram has rendered on the Mexican field of battle and in the Civil War that we are so ungrateful, so parsimonious as to deny the estate of this old two-times veteran that which is justly due and unpaid?

I want to read into the RECORD the record of this old veteran:

In the Mexican War he enlisted as private in Company A of the First Kentucky Cavalry, Humphrey Marshall, colonel, and at the end of the first month was promoted to orderly sergeant; he participated in the Battle of Buena Vista, where he was wounded. He served until the close of the Mexican War; then returning to his home at Lancaster, Ky., when the troops were mustered out.

At the commencement of the Civil War, in 1861, he entered the Government service at Camp Dick Robinson, Ky., and was commissioned colonel of the First Kentucky Cavalry, which position he soon resigned on account of his dislike to the Cavalry service. Under orders from Gen. Sherman, he took charge of the Government grounds at Harrodsburg, Ky., and in two months recruited the Nineteenth Kentucky Infantry Regiment and was commissioned its colonel. He participated in the following battles: Chickasaw Bayou, Arkansas Post, Port Gibson, Champion Hills, Black River Bridge, siege of Vicksburg, and siege of Jackson. In these battles he commanded the Second Brigade, Fourth Division, Thirteenth Army Corps, composed of the Nineteenth Kentucky, Forty-eighth Ohio, Seventy-seventh, Ninety-seventh, One hundred and thirtieth Illinois Regiments, and the Chicago Mercantile Battery. In the Battle of Sabine Cross Roads, La., he commanded the Fourth Division, Thirteenth Army Corps. In 1865 he was promoted to brigadier general of Volunteers and commanded the Baton Rouge district for some time. He had charge of the Cavalry camp of instruction at New Orleans, and when the end of the war finally came returned to his home in Lancaster, Ky.

This is the type of man that certain men on this floor will undertake to defeat that has passed through the Supreme Court of the United States, and ask you to vote against the passage of a bill, of such a man, with such a conspicuous record as I have disclosed.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. Is the gentleman convinced that this is a just claim?

Mr. HELM. If my earnestness, zeal, and enthusiasm for this claim has not been sufficient to demonstrate that I think it is an honost claim, I do not know how to do it.

Mr. SLOAN. And the gentleman says that this is a claim by a real Kentucky colonel?

Mr. HELM. Yes; he was a brigadier general in the Civil War.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when I used to practice law I always noticed that the attorney who had a very bad case dwelt a great deal on the manliness of his client if he was a man and the loveliness of his client if she was a woman. And my friend from Kentucky, having no merits in his proposition, according to my views, dwelt with great eloquence on the fact that his constituent or claimant was a brigadier general or other officer in the Civil War and was also in the Mexican War. That may be a sufficient reason, although I doubt it. If Congress wants to vote Gen. Landram something over $5,000 because he was in the war, that is all right. A great many other people would like to have the money.

My father was in the Mexican War and in the Civil War, but I would disown him if he ever asked or demanded a claim like this against the Government.

What are the facts in the case. Gen. Landram—and I accept the gentleman's statement that he was a general, although the report calls him "Mr."—was a collector of internal revenue in Kentucky from July 1, 1873, to July 4, 1885, a term of 12 years, and a desirable job. Most of the collectors of internal revenue have nothing themselves to do except to draw their salaries, the deputies or chief deputy managing the office. They have responsibility, and I am perfectly willing that they should be paid reasonable salaries. By the act of 1872, carried as section 3314 in the Revised Statutes, Congress provided:

SEC. 3314. The books of tax-paid stamps issued to any collector shall be charged to his account at the full value of the tax on the number of gallons represented on the stamps and coupons contained in said books; and every collector shall make a monthly return to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of all tax-paid stamps issued by him to be affixed to any cask or package containing distilled spirits on which the tax has been paid, and account for the amount of the tax collected; and when the said collector returns to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue any book of marginal stubs, which it shall be his duty to do as soon as all the stamps contained in the book when issued to him have been used, and accounts for the tax on the number of gallons represented on the stamps and coupons that were contained in said book, there shall be allowed to the collector a commission of one-half of 1 per cent on the amount of such tax, in addition to any other commission by law allowed: Provided, That the total net compensation of collectors, as fixed by this title, shall not be thereby increased. All stamps relating to distilled spirits, other than the tax-paid stamps, shall be charged to collectors as representing the value of 10 cents for each stamp; and the books containing such stamps may be intrusted by any collector to the gauger of the district, who shall make a daily report to the collector of all such stamps used by him and for whom used, and from these reports the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall assess the person for whom they were used; and the collector shall thereupon collect the amount due for such stamps, at the rate of 10 cents for each stamp issued during the month; and when all the stamps contained in any such book have been issued, the gauger of the district shall return the book to the collector, with all the marginal stubs therein.

That act was amendatory of a previous act which contained the provision for a certain percentage to be paid to the assessors and a certain percentage to the collectors, and gave to the collector the percentage which theretofore had been paid to both the collector and the assessor. The previous act of June 30, 1864, being section 3145 of the Revised Statutes, provided:

SEC. 3145. There shall be allowed to collectors, in full compensation for their services, and for those of their deputies, a salary of $1,500 per annum, to be paid quarterly, and, in addition thereto, a commission of 3 per cent upon the first $100,000, of 1 per cent upon all sums above $100,000 and not exceeding $400,000, and of one-half of 1 per cent on all sums above $400,000 and not exceeding $1,000,000, and of one-eighth of 1 per cent on all sums above $1,000,000; such commissions to be computed upon the amounts by them, respectively, collected and paid over and accounted for under the instructions of the Treasury Department; except that in determining the compensation to be allowed to any collector the commission shall be computed on only one-half of the tax received on any articles which shall have been transported from his district in bond, and on only one-half of the tax received on any articles received in his district in bond, where such transportation has been by shipment from one district to another. And there shall be further paid, after the account thereof has been rendered to and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury, to each collector his necessary and reasonable charges for advertising, stationery, and blank books used in the performance of his official duties, and for postage actually paid on letters and documents received or sent, and exclusively relating to official business; but no such account shall be allowed unless it states the date and the particular items of every such expenditure, and is verified by the oath of the collector. The Secretary of the Treasury may make such further allowances from time to time, as may be reasonable, in cases where, by reason of the territorial extent of the district, or the amount of internal taxes collected, or other circumstances, it may seem just to make such allowances. But the total net compensation of a collector shall not in any case exceed $4,500 a year; and no collector shall be entitled to any portion of the salary pertaining to his office unless he shall have been confirmed by the Senate, except in cases of commissions to fill vacancies which happen by death or resignation during the recess of the Senate.

Let us see now what the facts are in this case. I have read the law, because I thought it was appropriate to have a little information about the law once in a while for the benefit of our Democratic Members, who to-day, by a vote of 103 to 75, voted to dispense with the transaction of public business for the day. Think of it! A great party in control of the Government does not know how to manage the House, much less the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will request gentlemen in the rear of the Hall to please retire to the cloakroom if they desire to converse. Unless they do we can not transact business.

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, they are not bothering me. Of course we are not going to transact much business any way, and if we transacted all there is it would not amount to a row of pins. Our Democratic friends want to keep us here this summer. Well, we will be on the job. I do not blame them. They want to have as much time as they can in Congress, for they will not have much after this term. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman in favor of abolishing the Committee on Claims and not permitting persons who have been damaged in different ways, as is alleged by this committee, to ever get any pay from the Government of the United States? Is that the gentleman's doctrine? If that is his doctrine, it is a very strange one.

Mr. MANN. I will yield for another speech, if the gentleman desires to make it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am through, thank you. The gentleman has not answered the question.

Mr. MANN. The question is such a silly question——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it silly to know whether or not the gentleman wants to abolish that committee?

Mr. MANN. It is such a silly question——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is that the gentleman's reply?

Mr. MANN. It is not worth a reply.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. When one gentleman asks another gentleman a question, he expects to be answered in a gentlemanly way.

Mr. MANN. The question was not intended to be a gentlemanly question, and that is the reason it got the answer it did.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the gentleman answered the question yet as to whether or not he would abolish the Committee on Claims? Has the gentleman answered the question that I asked him at first, whether or not he is in favor of abolishing this committee and paying no claims whatever against the Government?

Mr. MANN. I say that is such a silly question that it is not worth answering; but I will answer it. I am not in favor of abolishing the Committee on Claims. I am in favor of paying all claims which the Government owes. I would do it without putting men to the trouble of coming to Congress for claims which the Government owes. There is no claim here on this calendar where the Government owes the money. A man who has a legal claim against the Government has no trouble in getting it paid at all. Anybody who has a legal claim against the Government, if it is not paid promptly, can go to the Court of Claims at any time or in any district court of the United States and commence suit against the Government, and when he recovers judgment, that judgment is paid by this Congress as a matter of course. Now, my friend from Texas does not know that, he is not familiar enough in his long term of service in the House to know that a man who has a legal claim against the Government gets paid without question.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand there is but one wise man in this House, and that is the gentleman who represents the minority in the House.

Mr. MANN. He may not be the gentleman from Illinois representing the minority, but if there is one wise man in the House it certainly is not the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And I can retort the same way about the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is all right; I have no——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman assumes to know everything that is done in this House.

Mr. MANN. Well, I know a great deal more of what is done in the House than the gentleman from Texas, who would not assume to know anything. When I read the statute—and that is all I have done so far, read the statute—the gentleman from Texas jumps up and impugns my knowledge of the statute which I have just read. He does not believe it is in the statute. I am willing to get him a copy of the Revised Statutes and let him read it, although if he read it he would not understand it. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, that is all right. I have no feeling against the gentleman from Texas, and he has not any against me. This is merely part of the byplay of legislative work. I am glad the gentleman interrupted me with a question that did not amount to anything, and he knew it, because it relieved me for the moment of pursuing my mild course upon this bill. [Laughter.]

I have read the statute. What are the facts? Gen. Landram was the collector of internal revenue in this Kentucky district for 12 years, and this old act of Congress provided that collectors and assessors should each be allowed commissions of one-half of 1 per cent on stamps placed on packages of distilled spirits. By the subsequent act, which I quoted, that old act was changed and the collector was given compensation by way of commissions provided they did not amount to more than $4,500 a year, including his other emoluments. He went into this office and held it for 12 years and took the pay that was allowed him, and received, as was found by the Court of Claims, a special allowance from the Secretary of the Treasury, in addition to his salary, which I believe was $1,500 a year. He never complained about not getting all of his compensation during his 12 years of service.

There were probably many other distinguished gentlemen in Kentucky who were quite willing to fill his shoes at the pay that he was drawing, but he preferred to draw it. He kept his fees and took the pay which was allowed him. After he went out of office in 1885 he retained Gen. Green B. Raum, of my State, as his attorney to try if he could get more money out of the Government. Gen. Raum was one of the ablest men whom Illinois ever sent to Washington. He himself, if I recollect correctly, at one time was Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and, I believe, Commissioner of Pensions. He knew the game from the ground up in regard to the payment of collectors of internal revenue. What Gen. Raum did not know about it will never be learned by anybody else belonging to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HELM. According to the report of the committee, the case was brought to a hearing on its merits on the 2d day of December, 1902, James H. Embry, Esq., appearing for the claimant and the Attorney General by E. C. Brandenburg, Esq. Raum had nothing to do with it.

Mr. MANN. I say Gen. Raum was attorney in the case, and I know. I have the facts. Who appeared before the Court of Claims and took testimony I do not know. But he knew this case, and when that claim was filed it was filed for commissions up to July 1, 1879. It is very hard to tell from the report, because there are so many contradictory things in this report, and you can not tell certainly what dates are involved. But I think the claim that was made was up to July 1, 1879, commencing with his induction into office. The case went to the Supreme Court of the United States on a claim subsequent to July 1, 1879, and the Supreme Court held that Gen. Landram was entitled to these commissions subsequent to July 1, 1879. There is not a line in any evidence that has ever been presented here as to whether the situation was different before July 1, 1879, from what it was after July 1, 1879, except an intimation that at one of these times a special allowance was made by the Secretary of the Treasury to Mr. Landram which, as he was notified, was intended by the Secretary to be "in lieu of all other kinds and forms of compensation for his services so rendered as collector of internal revenue, and which, so far as the record shows, appears to have been accepted by him without protest or objection." I quote from the finding of the Court of Claims.

Now, I do not know whether the claim prior to 1879 was not included because it would be barred by the statute of limitations or not. However, I apprehend that would have been a sufficient reason. But I must confess I can not see the merit of the proposition where a man goes into an office of this character and high pay and takes the compensation that is allowed to him, fully satisfied with what he gets, and then when he goes out of office and tries to get additional compensation to that which was awarded to him where it is not barred by the statute of limitations, as I say, I can not see why we should remove the bar of the statute of limitations. There is no moral equity in the claim at all. Let me give you an illustration. A few years ago we had quite a contest in this House in reference to the payment of mileage growing out of an extra session of Congress which ran into the regular December session. It was held by the authorities of the House that there were two sessions of Congress. A mileage appropriation had been made for that fiscal year for the regular session of Congress. That mileage appropriation had, however, been applied to the payment of mileage for the special session of Congress.

The law did not provide for mileage for the special session of Congress. It does for mileage for the regular session. I was here with many others who are here now. All received mileage for the special session of Congress, not authorized by law. I have never received mileage for the regular session of Congress, and which is specifically provided for by law. I did not receive the mileage because this House did not have the desire, not to mention the courage, to vote the appropriation to pay for mileage which the law said they were entitled to. Well, if I live a number of years, and should come back here and ask Congress to vote me that mileage, I hope you will execrate my name, and if I die and anybody representing me ever does, I hope you will execrate their action. And yet I have a far better legal claim than Gen. Landram has if all he says is true.

He held office and was satisfied with the emoluments. Now, I have an idea that those were days when there were some hard times in the country. We were running along from 1874 to 1879, getting up to the point where we should return to specie payments; and during nearly all of that time the Democratic Party was in control of this House. The presidential offices were held by Republicans. Undoubtedly this man was a Republican. The Democratic Party, seeking to be economical then, as it certainly does not seek to be now, sought to restrict some of the appropriations, and I think properly, and sought to keep down some of the salaries, and I think properly. And it is barely possible that the full compensation which the law otherwise would have allowed Gen. Landram was not provided for. But, did he resign? Not on your life! He knew that a statute of limitations barred a claim after five years. Did he file a suit in the Court of Claims? Certainly not, because that would have meant his resignation would be asked for. He was glad to keep the job.

The Democratic House now stops the consideration of the great Post Office appropriation bill for the purpose of hunting out a claim barred by the statute of limitations, which had no merit in itself originally, in order to pay a claim which Congress in the seventies and the administration in the seventies would not pay. That is a record of economy for this House. It is truly wonderful. I suppose there are private bills enough on the Private Calendar at this time—represented by a very large share of the gentlemen who are present, there being less than 50 Members of the House in the Hall, but when the vote will be taken 50 more will be counted in the anterooms—I think probably there are enough, if you hang together, to pass any claim of this sort. But it does not prevent the fact that the country is getting a little suspicious of Congress, which in the last few years has spent a good deal more money trying to extract money from the Treasury for illegitimate purposes under questionable circumstances than it has in legislating for the good of the people. I suppose you will pursue that course. Go ahead. I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I think the attack of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] upon the Committee on Claims is unwarranted. In the last Congress that committee considered and reported, I am informed, a larger number of bills than any former Committee on Claims for quite a number of years. During that Congress the Committee on Claims did not take up as much as a whole legislative day of the House of Representatives, and every single bill that was reported, excepting possibly as many as I can count on the fingers of my two hands, went through this House by unanimous consent. That has been the record of our committee in the past. And because the Committee on Claims is suggesting that it has the right to this day under the rules of the House, it seems to me unfair, to say the least, that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the leader on that side of the Chamber, should attempt to make political capital out of the fact that we are asking for our rights under the rules.

I regret also that there has been any suggestion of politics in the consideration of these matters. I say to the gentleman from Illinois that we are trying to do honest and faithful work. We do not always report bills that can be unanimously passed by the House, but our record in the last Congress was we were able to pass more than 200 bills by unanimous consent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe in wasting time in talk. I think the House is fully advised as to the character of this bill, and I am going to ask unanimous consent now that after this bill is disposed of the balance of the calendar be considered by unanimous consent. After going through the calendar by unanimous consent, if there are any contested bills I ask that they be taken up then. I submit that request now.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, what was the request?

Mr. POU. That after this bill is disposed of we go through the calendar by unanimous consent and dispose of as many bills as possible by unanimous consent, and then come back to the contested bills.

Now, I will say there has been considerable time taken up in the discussion of these two bills. There are some 44 bills here, and I think we can pass some 30 or 40 of them by unanimous consent. I hope the House will grant the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent that, after this bill is disposed of, the bills be called in order on the calendar and only considered by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. POU. Then I hope the gentleman will not charge anybody else hereafter that we attempted to kill the time of the House. I ask for a vote on this bill, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. POU] that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. POU. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 23.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota demands tellers.

Mr. CRISP. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. The Chair has just counted and there is no quorum. Under the rules of the House is it not the duty of the Chair to order a roll call?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had ordered a roll call.

Mr. CRISP. I thought the Chair was putting the motion for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HELM. Under the status of the House those who are in favor of the passage of this bill will vote "aye"?

The CHAIRMAN. The question was on the motion to lay aside the bill with a favorable recommendation; but the House is in committee, and we are trying to ascertain the presence of a quorum now.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ashbrook	Driscoll	Hart	Loft
Austin	Drukker	Haskell	Longworth
Bacharach	Dyer	Hay	McClintic
Blackmon	Estopinal	Hayes	McCracken

The committee rose; and Mr. RAKER having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee having found itself without a quorum, he had ordered the roll to be called, whereupon 310 Members—a quorum—had answered to their names, and he reported therewith the names of the absentees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the situation. When the committee found itself without a quorum it was voting on a motion to lay aside with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1584) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Louis Landram, administrator of William J. Landram, deceased, and no quorum voted on that. The Chair will put the question de novo. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I hope we can have an agreement. The Committee on Claims does not aspire very high in the autonomy of this House. It is a very humble committee, but strives to be useful. It has got some very hard-working members; they have done very diligent work; and all we are asking now is a chance to put through those bills to which nobody will object. I can not see any occasion for any partisan exhibition here to-day. There is certainly no occasion for any feeling.

I am going to renew that request, Mr. Chairman. I hope we can go through these forty-odd bills and eliminate those to which there is no objection, and after we have done that, if there is any time left, take up that time in the discussion of contested bills. I ask unanimous consent now, Mr. Chairman, that we go through the calendar by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent that the calendar be called through and each bill called up, and if there is any objection, it be passed over until we have gone through the calendar, and then recur to the first contested bill on the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

REIMBURSEMENT OF POSTMASTER AT KEGG, PA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4881) to reimburse the postmaster at Kegg, Pa., for money and stamps taken by burglars.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $88.27 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of reimbursing Anatasia Hogan, postmaster at Kegg, Bedford County, Pa., for money and stamps stolen from that office by burglars March 7, 1910, the said Anatasia Hogan having made good the loss to the Post Office Department out of her own funds by payment of the aforementioned sum to an inspector of the said department February 28, 1912.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, this is a small bill, but doubtless it is important to the party concerned. It received the attention of the Committee on Claims, and was considered upon its merits, and we believe there are strong reasons why it should be enacted by the House.

The claimant is the postmistress at Kegg, in the State of Pennsylvania, keeping a small post office. It seems that she had no safe in the place where the post office was kept. It was a small country store, and during the night burglars broke open the door of the building and took away less than $90 in money and stamps. Now, the department says that technically the postmistress is responsible to the Government for this small amount of money, for the reason that, having no safe, if she left the building it was her duty to lock up the money and stamps. We thought she was excused from that technical obligation by the fact which appears, that her mother was taken fatally ill and died shortly after the burglary, the postmistress having vacated the office suddenly on account of the violent and fatal illness of her mother.

It also appears that the burglary was extremely violent, that the door was broken down, that the money drawer was forcibly ripped from its counter, and the desk where the Government money was kept—at the time unlocked—was rifled of its contents; and it is evident that even if the desk had been locked, the burglars, having forcibly taken the money drawer, would doubtless have taken the drawer from the desk; and in view of the fact that this was a technical obligation, the lack of the performance of which by her was excusable under the circumstances, as the committee think, we have unanimously reported the bill favorably.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation. Pending that, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McLEMORE].

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks on a resolution which I have introduced.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from North Carolina runs short of time, I will yield him a part of mine, because I do not desire to delay the committee. I want to expedite the consideration of these claims as much as possible.

Mr. Chairman, I was, I will not say surprised, but, rather, sorry, that the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] a few moments ago jumped all over me, as it were, because I had criticized the Claims Committee. Now, I have not criticized the Claims Committee to-day. If anyone can find in the RECORD—and what I say is never changed by me—any statement of mine in which I have criticized the Claims Committee, I will be thankful to have it pointed out. It is to me a new doctrine that if a man in the House does not favor a bill reported by a committee he is thereby criticizing the committee. That is rather an anomalous proposition. Under that theory Republicans would never have an opportunity to express an opinion upon a partisan measure brought before the House by the Democratic majority. I do not take as a criticism of the Committee on Claims the fact that I have criticized some of the bills reported by that committee. On the contrary——

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. When I get ready I will. On the contrary, I stated awhile ago that the Committee on Claims, under the leadership and chairmanship of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], both in this Congress and the preceding Congress, had done what I thought was exceedingly good work. Now, that is the only thing I said about the committee. [Applause.] I do not consider that a criticism of the committee. Now, I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. POU. I understood from the gentleman's attitude as much as from what he said—and I am speaking seriously—that the gentleman was complaining, and that he thought something unusual or unprecedented had been done because the Committee on Claims has insisted upon its right to its day, and that the gentleman felt aggrieved, felt that somebody had done him some injury, because the House voted that the committee should have the day to which it is entitled under the rules.

Mr. MANN. I assure the gentleman I am in no state of grief. If I have appeared aggrieved, it is a strange thing.

Mr. POU. I understood the gentleman to say, a while ago, that he wanted to help expedite matters as much as possible. Why is the gentleman not willing to give unanimous consent to go through this calendar by unanimous consent, and get rid of the bills that are not objected to?

Mr. MANN. Well, that would be unfair to the bill that is now before the House. Here is a bill to pay a claim to a poor woman over in Pennsylvania, a postmistress who was robbed of a small amount of money. The bill passed the last House. The amount stated in the present bill is erroneous. I should have had to object to it, but it is fair that the bill should be considered and the proper amount allowed. Owing to the carelessness of some one making the computation, or else my carelessness in figuring the computation, the amount is not correct; and while the difference is not great, yet it is worth while to have it considered.

Now, the gentleman says that by my attitude I show grief. Let me say frankly to the House, under the rules of the House each Friday can be made into a claims day. That is what the rules provide, that it shall be in order on each Friday, or on four Fridays in each month, to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. I have been a Member of the House now for nearly 19 years. No member of the Committee on Claims in the past, as a general thing, has ever invoked that rule as against a great public appropriation bill. We set aside Monday especially, we set aside Wednesday especially, we make it possible to set Friday especially, and there is not time enough to transact the public business in the other three days of the week if we give these Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays every week.

Mr. POU. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. I will yield in a moment, but I would like to make a connected statement.

Mr. POU. I will take the opportunity in my own time, but the gentleman wants to be fair——

Mr. MANN. I do not ask the gentleman to tell me whether I want to be fair or not. I leave that to the House, whether I am fair or not.

Mr. POU. All right.

Mr. MANN. The House can not finish its business and adjourn before next autumn on the basis on which the majority side of the House are now operating, taking out three days in the week, so far in the main for inconsequential matters.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. In a moment. The Committee on Claims has been well treated by the House in the last Congress. It has done very efficient work. I think the present Committee on Claims are probably the most careful Committee on Claims that we have had for years. I am glad to compliment the committee upon that. They will get a good many bills passed through Congress, but they will not get many bills passed by antagonizing public bills of great importance that ought to have the priority, and they might as well find that out one time as another.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. No; not yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MANN. Now, I am not criticizing the Committee on Claims for seeking their day. That is the duty of the chairman of the committee. He has that responsibility. I do not think the Speaker ought to have recognized him for that purpose, but he did. It is his business to seek recognition. What I criticize is the Democratic side of the House, which voted by a large majority this afternoon to set aside the public business in order to pass these few claims.

Mr. POU. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman to the agreement I had. I will say to the gentleman that on yesterday I had an agreement with the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads that the Committee on Claims should get in to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Very well; let us see what he will say.

Mr. POU. The chairman voted no himself on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the Post Office bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether we have got to that point where a man's word is not good in the House. Last night in the House this colloquy took place: Mr. BUCHANAN, my colleague, had asked leave to address the House to-day:

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, would it be convenient to address the House at some other time?

Supposedly because he expected to get the time to-day on the Post Office bill.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Tennessee expect to go ahead with the Post Office bill to-morrow?
Mr. MOON. We want to do so.
Mr. MANN. I do not object.

Now, if the gentleman from North Carolina had an agreement with the gentleman from Tennessee that the gentleman from Tennessee was to give way to-day, then the gentleman from Tennessee was not frank with me in the House.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MOON. I am sorry that this discussion came up.

Mr. MANN. I did not bring it on.

Mr. MOON. I know that; but the gentleman from North Carolina said to me yesterday after this occurred that he wanted to come in to-day, and asked if I would have objection. I asked him how long he would occupy the floor to-day, and he said about two hours, and not longer, in his opinion. I said, "Then we are willing to yield to you for to-morrow," the expectation being that it would end in two hours. Of course, if it had not been concluded in two hours I will be frank enough to say that I would not undertake to take the day from him.

Mr. MANN. We all know that the word of either gentleman is good, and if there was any trouble it was owing to a misunderstanding.

Mr. POU. Did not the gentleman from Tennessee also use the expression that he thought we were entitled to our day?

Mr. MOON. I think that is true. I think if a day is set apart for anything, we ought to use the day for the business for which it is set apart as far as possible. I fully agree, however, with the suggestion that the public business would be better carried on and expedited if we would take up an appropriation bill and carry it through without its being stopped by any special day. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the prospective trouble of a long session is due to the rules of the House setting aside three days in the week for other than what he terms public business?

Mr. MANN. No; it is not due to the rules of the House; it is due to the action of the House, because, outside of Calendar Wednesday, the House can dispose of the other two days any time it pleases.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Then, it is due to the House observing its rules?

Mr. MANN. It is due to the House observing its desires, but not observing its rules. A majority of the Democratic side observes its desire to fool around about petty business instead of attending to the business of the Nation.

Now, I am sorry to detain the committee a moment by references which were drawn out by my distinguished friend from North Carolina.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I notice that the gentleman from Illinois is troubled about the waste of time. Since I have been here he has wasted twice as much time by filibustering as anybody else.

Mr. MANN. I may have wasted some time of the House. I have occupied more time than the gentleman from Texas, but I have not wasted near as much as he did, for all the time that he occupied in the House was pure waste. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the last House we passed a bill in behalf of this same lady, introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY], which did not become a law, for the sum of $72.54. I do not know that I would dwell upon these small amounts but for the fact that we have two bills pending on this calendar, one for $7 and the other for $10, and if they are important enough to take up the time of the House I think that these small amounts are important enough to take up time. The bill in the last House, introduced by the same gentleman under the same circumstances, was for $72.54. The bill in this House is $88.27, and I will ask the distinguished gentleman from Maine, who made the report, or anybody else, how they arrive at the amount of $88.27.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman will see by the report that the first amount was $72.54; that was the cash; and that the second amount was for the stamps, which was not included in the former bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has the report. What was the first amount?

Mr. PETERS. Seventy-two dollars and fifty-four cents.

Mr. MANN. And the postal fund was $12. Anything else?

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman will see by following along that there were diverse statements as to different amounts, varying $3 or $4. I presume the clerk of the committee, in making up the final report, took one statement to be correct. Does the gentleman from Illinois object to $4 of the amount?

Mr. MANN. Here is an affidavit, and the claimant sworn to, in which he makes the sum——

Mr. PETERS. Eighty-four dollars and fifty-four cents.

Mr. MANN. Which it appears makes $84.54.

Mr. PETERS. Whereas the bill is for $88.27.

Mr. MANN. And the committee, in preference to taking the sworn statement of the claimant as to the amount of the loss, wanders around and hunts up a letter written by somebody to a Member of Congress, and attempts to find out how they can enlarge the amount.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PETERS. The letter referred to was the letter of the Postmaster General. If the gentleman objects to the amount, I would be glad to offer an amendment reducing it.

Mr. MANN. Where is the letter to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. PETERS. It is the first letter, in the report, from the Postmaster General, Mr. Burleson.

Mr. MANN. I will read it. Let us see:

In response to your request for a statement of the facts in this case, I beg to inform you that the records of this department show that during the night of March 7, 1910, the post office at Kegg, Pa., was forcibly entered by burglars, who took $12 in postal funds and $72.54 in postage stamps, etc.

And that is all there is on the subject in the Postmaster General's letter. So my friend from Maine [Mr. PETERS] and the rest of the committee will have to find some other excuse than that.

Mr. PETERS. Is not that all that we can do on the subject? If the Postmaster General shows the records of the office amount to $84.54——

Mr. MANN. Then why report the bill for $88.27?

Mr. PETERS. That may be an error of four dollars and some cents.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I simply did this for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that even so great and careful a committee as the Committee on Claims might make a report without ever reading the record of the case or by letting the Clerk make the report and never examining the figures on file before them. Having a report from the Postmaster General stating a certain amount, and having a sworn affidavit from the claimant giving the same amount, the committee reported a bill for a larger amount than either the claimant asked for or the Postmaster General reported was in dispute. For carefulness, of course, that would excite the attention of anyone, and I commend the committee again for its great carefulness in other cases, but not in this case.

Mr. PETERS. Does the gentleman notice that the claim originated in 1911, and that an ordinary amount of interest would be much in excess of the difference between the two?

Mr. MANN. That is what I hoped I would get from the gentleman. That is really what I was fishing for—to see whether the Committee on Claims had adopted the practice of including interest in these claims. It has been the unwritten and the written rule of this House ever since claims were allowed at all that we would not allow interest on these claims which are really a matter of gratuity.

Mr. PETERS. Does the gentleman see that the amount allowed is very much less than interest would be, so that we did not do any such thing?

Mr. MANN. Yes; but the gentleman's real excuse——

Mr. PETERS. I ask the gentleman if he has observed that the amount of the discrepancy is very much less than the interest would be if interest was figured upon the claim?

Mr. MANN. But how did the committee get the amount named in the bill? I do not seek to embarrass my friend from Maine, because I know perfectly well that the clerk of the committee probably wrote the report and perhaps told the committee what to do with this small claim. I do not think that is the case usually with the committee. I know that the Committee on Claims and its members are doing good work and standing out against a lot of claims that ought not to be allowed, and I hope that the committee will continue to do that.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, answering the question of the gentleman, I am unable to tell him to a cent how this amount of $88.27 is made up. I presume by going to the records of the committee we may find evidence or affidavits which will satisfy the gentleman as to how the amount was made up, but without doing that I can not give him the exact data.

Mr. MANN. I guarantee there is nothing over there that will satisfy anyone as to how it was made up. I have no doubt whatever, not the slightest, that it was a typographical error on the part of the man who drew the bill in the first instance, and the committee never examined the bill or the facts in the case enough to know what it was about.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I would like to renew the request and see if we can not go through the calendar by unanimous consent from now on. We have only a short time remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent from now on the Private Calendar be called and bills be taken up by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the Clerk will call the next bill.

LILLIE B. RANDELL.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6180) for the relief of Lillie B. Randell.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Lillie B. Randell, of London, England, was on April 15, 1912, and is now the owner of the following bonds of the United States: Thirty 4 per cent bonds issued under the authority of an act of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, of the denomination of $1,000 each, numbered 8234, 15312, 15313, 25050, 26079, 39394,

41235, 45284, 58704, 55979, 63524, 63525, 63526, 63527, 63528, 72948, 72949, 72950, 72951, 72952, 72953, 72954, 72955, 72956, 72957, 72958, 72959, 81548, 89015, and 90013; thirty 3 per cent bonds issued under the authirty of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures," approved June 30, 1898, of the denomination of $500 each, numbered 81002, 89693, 93333, 99707, 104383, 110614, 118375, 130780, 132932, 136576, 136580, 137224, 139332, 145446, 147588, 148685, 152922, 152923, 152945, 157744, 158522, 158523, 158524, 158987, 158988, 159056, 160984, 164003, 164858, and 166862; ten 3 per cent bonds issued under the authority of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures," approved June 13, 1898, of the denomination of $1,000 each, numbered 20146, 20266, 20773, 20935, 20936, 20938, 27596, 37896, 47937, and 47938; and

Whereas the said Lillie B. Randell did, prior to April 15, 1912, detach from the said bonds the coupons due February 1, 1912, and May 1, 1912, to wit: Sixty coupons for the amount of $10 each, 60 coupons for the amount of $3.75 each, and 20 coupons for the amount of $7.50 each, and through her agents, Messrs. Morgan, Grenfell & Co., of London, did deposit the same in the mail at London in two registered letters addressed to Messrs. Drexel & Co., Philadelphia, to be sent by the steamship Titanic; and

Whereas the said steamship Titanic, on April 15, 1912, by reason of a collision, sank, whereby the said letters containing the said coupons were irrevocably lost: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $975 to the said Lillie B. Randell or her duly authorized agent: Provided, That before paying the same the said Lillie B. Randell shall deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury a good and sufficient bond, with the security to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnify the United States against all losses, costs, or damages incurred by reason of making the said payment.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Page 4, line 9, strike out the word "security" and insert the word "surety."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, this bill is intended to reimburse Mrs. Randell, a resident of this country but residing temporarily in London, for an amount of money due her, being interest on certain bonds of the United States owned by her. The bonds were shipped by mail and lost on the steamer Titanic when it was wrecked. There is no question at all as to this money being due her, but it is impossible for her to collect it, as there is no law under which the Treasury Department can repay it. Mrs. Randell furnishes the Government with a bond to indemnify it against any claims that may come up at a later date owing to the finding of these coupons through any other agency.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommndation.

JOHN H. JANSSEN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3896) for the relief of John H. Janssen.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,355, in full compensation for all claims, to John H. Janssen, of Woonsocket, S. Dak., found and held to be due him by the Secretary of the Interior under contract of January 15, 1907, for drilling two 6-inch artesian wells on the shores of Lake Andes, in the Yankton Indian Reservation, in Charles Mix County, S. Dak.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, this bill involves a forfeiture in a contract with the Government. The claimant made a regular contract with the representatives of the Government to build two artesian wells, and in that contract there was a provision that if the work was not done by a certain date there should be a forfeiture of $5 a day; and there were other provisions in the contract specifying that the work should be done at the end of a reasonable time, and so forth, which appeared to be inconsistent with the provision touching the matter of forfeiture; but, regardless of that, it appears here by a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior that the work of the contractor was completed finally in a satisfactory manner and that the department suffered no damage by reason of the delay for which the forfeiture was exacted. The committee considered that the equitable and proper thing to do was to waive the forfeiture by the Government, inasmuch as the Government had received no inconvenience, suffered no damage, and the contractor was shown to have used reasonable diligence in prosecuting the work. The reason why his work was not completed according to the contract being that the pipe which was necessary to the conduct of the work was not furnished by the manufacturers in season, and for those reasons the committee have recommended the pasage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that this is a claim which has merit to it, and I would not take time at all except for a few statements in the report of this case. The Government advertised for bids and received bids, one of the specifications to go into the contract being for a $5-per-day penalty or forfeiture if the work was not completed within a certain time. The contract was not signed for some little time after the bids were received, as stated by the committee. I think 50 days' time elapsed. There was not a great deal of time allowed for the digging of the well. The advertisements provide for specifications, as is usually the case, and there is a delay between the time of receiving the bids and the letting of the contract. That is a very common thing everywhere. Now, the contract provided for a penalty for a delay, said delay not being on the part of the party of the first part—that is, the delay of the Government—and the committee say, "The department certainly was at fault to the extent of 50 days' delay in approving the contract." I do not see how there can be any justification for that statement. I would not be willing to vote for the bill without saying that I entirely disapprove of the proposition where the Government makes a contract with a penalty in it and the fault not being caused by the Government, that it is to be taken as the delay before the contract is signed, between the receiving of bids and the letting of the contract. Under that provision there never could be a forfeiture or penalty collected because everyone could always set up that there was some delay between the time of receiving the bids and the letting of the contract. Under that statement of the committee any delay would be a delay of the Government. Nor can I accede to the proposition in the report that because the Government permitted the work to go on after the time for completing it had expired, that therefore the Government waives the penalty.

Here is a contract where a man agreed to dig an artesian well within a certain time, with a penalty of $5 a day after that fixed time, and after that time had passed the contractor went ahead with his work, and in the end completed the well, yet the committee say the superintendent having permitted this work to go on without objection at the time that that is the reason for waiving the penalty, as though that were a legal reason for waiving the penalty. In this particular case there was great difficulty in getting these wells, and the Government in the end got the wells which it wanted, and if it pays the claim here will not pay an excessive amount for it; but I hope that it will not be considered that by voting this claim we notify the various departments of the Government that there is no use at all in any case to put a penalty provision in a contract, and if these statements in the report are taken as correct there would be no object in having a penalty in a contract and no object to any contractor to finish his work on time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

W. W. BLOOD.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2209) for the relief of W. W. Blood.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to W. W. Blood, of Greenville, Plumas County, Cal., the sum of $439.09, in full payment for all work and labor done and performed by him for the Government of the United States or its official representatives at the Indian school near Greenville, Indian Valley, Plumas County, Cal., during the year 1907.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendaton.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think that somebody ought to give some statement about this bill which has been floating around here so long. I am sure the gentleman from California wants to explain it. I feel a little more lenient toward this bill than I used to feel. I have got files here back a great many Congresses.

Mr. RAKER. I have the same, I will say to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is——

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard.

Mr. MANN. Two gentlemen had the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Nobody asked for recognition.

Mr. MANN. I beg the Chair's pardon; two of us asked for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, this bill was reported in the Sixty-second Congress, third session; passed the House and went to the Senate; was in an omnibus claims bill; was stricken out, and came back and passed the House the second time.

A favorable report was made on the bill in the Sixty-third Congress, third session, and the present Secretary of the Interior has made a favorable report upon the bill, as well as the Secretary who served during the Sixty-third Congress. The claim is for $330 in one item, which is for labor furnished at the Greenville Indian School in 1907, in digging a reservoir ditch from the principal reservoir and putting in a pipe and covering the same for 2,200 feet, when, as a matter of fact, it was 2,600 feet, at 15 cents a foot, amounting to $330.

The rest of the item, of $109.09, consists of lumber, 335 brick, labor, sand, and clay, and moving the bell. It was investigated by the chief clerk of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and found to be correct. The superintendent of the Greenville Indian School went upon the ground, made an investigation as to the work actually done, made an investigation as to the material furnished, and found that the material had been furnished and that the work had been done, and that it was reasonable and fair, and that the Government received the benefit thereof.

The men who furnished the lumber to Mr. Blood, the claimant, testified that they hauled and delivered the lumber at the Indian school; the men who furnished the brick made an affidavit to that fact, and also there is an affidavit of the work performed, and the man who assisted to see that the work was done. Mr. Blood made an affidavit and submitted it to the department, showing the actual condition.

Now, the money was provided for this claim, or there was a sufficient amount in the appropriation for the erection of the building, but it was not expended, and the work followed after the limitation of the time for which it could be used had expired, and, therefore, there was no money to pay it. The chief clerk makes this statement under the date of January 28, 1909.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 28, 1910.

W. W. BLOOD, Esq.,
Greenville, Cal.

SIR: The office has received a report from Harwood Hall, supervisor of Indian schools, relative to your claims of $330 and $109.09 for materials and labor furnished the Greenville School, California, during the fiscal year 1907.

You are advised that inasmuch as the balance of the fund from which these expenditures are payable, viz, "Indian school buildings, 1907," has been returned to the Treasury, this office is not in a position to approve your claims. Therefore the only recourse you have in the matter is by congressional action.

Very respectfully,

C. F. HAUKE, Chief Clerk.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. RAKER. May I make this statement, and then I will yield? Under date of November 30, 1909, after commenting on the lumber furnished and material and labor furnished, the moving of the bell, Mr. Hall, the supervisor, states:

From observation, inquiries, and testimony submitted there seems to be no question with regards to there being due W. W. Blood the amount of his claim, $109.09.

Now, as to the other claim, he makes this statement—that is, with reference to the $330 claim—on page 4 of the report:

It seems to me that, according to the records, testimony submitted, as well as the condition of the work at this day, W. W. Blood has a true claim for the amount of $330.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] for a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Nowhere in the report, so far as I have been able to find, does it state by whose authority this work was performed. As I glean from the report, he did this work virtually of his own volition, brought materials to this Indian reservation, without any authority from any official of the Indian Service.

Mr. RAKER. No; I think not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is there anywhere in the report anything that shows the contract under which this work was performed and by the authority of any official of the Government?

Mr. RAKER. There is not any written contract set out; no. But they received the work, got the benefit of the labor and material, and he was doing other work, and did the work and received pay for it, except this amount of $439.09, which has never been paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman give the committee full information, so far as he knows it, about this claim?

Mr. RAKER. I am trying to do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have had this matter up in former Congresses, and the information was not full. The report shows, if the gentleman will permit me, that a certain contractor was performing the work and then defaulted; and then this claimant, who had furnished material to the original contractor, undertook the work, but nowhere does it show whether the original contractor was paid in full for the work or not.

Mr. RAKER. That does not affect this man who actually did the work and furnished the material, according to all the records that are shown here.

Mr. STAFFORD. It only affects it in this particular, that under the contract originally granted to one person, who defaulted, the claimant goes ahead, without any authority, so far as the report shows, and performs work and furnishes material for some buildings which collapse, and which were of no use to the Government, and on which he places a claim for materials that were left on the premises, which were subsequently used.

Mr. RAKER. No; that is not the condition at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. That statement is confirmed by the report.

Mr. RAKER. No; the record shows to the contrary. The last man actually furnished the material, approved by the superintendent of the school, and they were put in the building and on the ground and used and accepted by the Government, and they were not paid for because the funds at that time had been exhausted.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to make one further inquiry upon that point.

Mr. RAKER. All right. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. This work was performed and the materials furnished, according to the report, in 1907. He never put in a claim until 1909. If he performed the work in 1907, why did he not receive compensation from the officials of the Indian Service?

Mr. RAKER. He was not in condition to receive it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes, he was. Why did he not put in a claim, then, and be paid out of the funds for the regular service?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes.

Mr. RAKER. The record shows that for the school buildings erected in 1907 the money had been passed over and was not available, and therefore there was no power by which the bill could be paid. Mr. Blood made his affidavit before the proper officer of his service, as follows:

GREENVILLE, CAL., November 30, 1909.

I, W. W. Blood, do solemnly swear that I agreed to furnish 1,200 feet of 3½-inch pipe and connect same with the pipe on the ground between the upper and lower reservoir at the Indian school, Greenville, Cal., also to raise the retaining wall of reservoir 1½ feet, and that I was to receive therefor the sum of $2,975; that I did furnish 1,200 feet of 3½-inch pipe, also 18 feet of 4-inch, 42 feet of 10-inch, and 85 feet of 2-inch pipe; that I started at the upper reservoir with 4-inch pipe, then reduced to 3½-inch (1,200 feet), then 3-inch, then 2½-inch, then 2-inch. The 10-inch pipe was put in at a point necessitating a large capacity, owing to the topography of the ground; that, in addition to the furnishing of 1,200 feet of 3½-inch pipe and other sizes, as heretofore set forth, and raising the reservoir, I excavated a trench or ditch 18 inches deep and 14 inches wide for a distance of 2,600 feet; that I laid the pipe in said trench and covered it with earth; that I not only filled my contract to the letter but dug the trench and raised reservoir dam 3½ feet instead of 1½ feet, as agreed, but also gave more pipe than I agreed, as well as one 1-inch gate valve; that the statement of George W. Wimberly that the distance between reservoirs is only 1,600 feet, is false; that I filled the contract honorably and most thoroughly; that I took up 85 feet of 1½-inch pipe at the lower end of the pipe line and did substitute 2-inch pipe instead; that I was not bound to do so, as I had furnished 1,200 feet of 3½-inch pipe and laid same, it being understood that I was to use the best of the old pipe line in order to complete the entire distance between the reservoirs, which I did; that Wimberly complained of there being a small stretch of 1½-inch pipe which had been a part of the old line. However, I took up 85 feet of 1½-inch pipe, all there was, and substituted and furnished at my expense 85 feet of 2-inch pipe in lieu thereof; that the entire length of the pipe line from upper to lower reservoirs is actually 2,625 feet instead of 1,600, as alleged by Wimberly; that there is justly and honestly due me $330 for excavating a 2,600-foot trench; that no part of same has been paid.

W. W. BLOOD.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 30th day of November, 1909.

J. R. MURRAY, Notary Public.

The same facts are set forth by Mr. Jones, the Acting Secretary, and by the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, dated January 21, 1916, which makes a favorable report upon the bill. The work was done. The material was furnished. The Government benefited and got all the material, and the only reason why the man was not paid was because of the time limit expiring under the Indian school building bill, and therefore he had to go back the next time before he received it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. RAKER. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. MANN. When was the work done?

Mr. RAKER. It was done in——

Mr. MANN. Nineteen hundred and seven.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. When was this money covered back into the Treasury?

Mr. RAKER. According to this, I will answer the gentleman, at the close of the fiscal year 1907.

Mr. MANN. That is not what it says.

Mr. RAKER. That is what I read in the report.

Mr. MANN. Read it and see.

Mr. RAKER. I will read it for the gentleman. I read:

You are advised that inasmuch as the balance of the fund from which these expenditures are payable, viz, "Indian school buildings, 1907," has been returned to the Treasury, this office is not in a position to approve your claims. Therefore, the only recourse you have in the matter is by congressional action.

It is on page 5, at the middle of the page.

Mr. MANN. I know. Now, the gentleman ought to know about his claim, although he is to be excused for not knowing much about it at present. He has had it so long that he is to be excused if he does not remember much about it. I say that in good faith. I am not criticizing the gentleman. This is the third Congress that this bill has been before the House. I do not suppose that many people look up, every time, these claims, although I do. If I had one of my own I do not think I would.

Now, the fact that this work was done in 1907, as I recall, and the money returned to the Treasury either at the end of 1909 or 1910. What I want to find out is why in the world this man did not present his bill to the Government during the two years in which the money was available?

Mr. RAKER. All right. I will answer the gentleman's question. In 1907, at the end of the fiscal year, there was no chance to pay the claim. The money was returned if not used. That is clear, is it not?

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The money is not covered into the Treasury until two years afterwards. Here is two years' time.

Mr. RAKER. I had always understood it was not payable at the end of the fiscal year. I have been so advised. If I have been advised wrongly, of course——

Mr. MANN. We make an appropriation, say, last year, for the year ending June 30, 1916. That is available for the payment of claims until June 30, 1918.

Mr. RAKER. Sure.

Mr. MANN. Now, there is no excuse for a man who has got a claim for doing work now and who goes around in the year 1919 with a bill. There is no excuse unless he is feeble-minded.

Mr. RAKER. This man is not feeble-minded.

Mr. MANN. I imagine not. I think, on the contrary, he thinks us to be feeble-minded. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. On page 3 of the report I want to read. This man at the very earliest date, not permitting laches to intervene, but on the 1st day of February, 1908, presented his claim to the superintendent of the Indian school for payment. I read:

Subject: Claim of W. W. Blood, of Greenville, Cal., for the sum of $109.09, growing out of labor and material furnished the United States at the Indian school, Greenville, Cal., as follows, viz, bill dated Greenville, Cal., February 1, 1908:

United States to W. W. Blood, Dr.—

Lumber	$33.99
335 pressed brick, at 6 cents	20.10
Labor, rebuilding furnace in the laundry	22.50
Sand and clay	7.50
Moving bell from top of building and erecting frame and putting bell on same	25.00
	109.09

Now, my understanding of the matter is that the money appropriated in 1905 for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1906, would lapse on the 30th of June, 1907, and that the money not expended during that fiscal year was converted into the Treasury. Now, this man did his work after that, thinking he would be paid, that is between the 1st of July, 1907, and the following year, filed his claim on the 1st day of February, 1908, for his money, and has been diligently pursuing that claim from that time to this.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. In just a moment I will yield. He took up the matter with the attorney general of the State of California, and here is a letter which shows that he was working at that time:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, June 21, 1910.

U. S. WEBB, Esq.,
Attorney at Law,
Humboldt Bank Building, San Francisco, Cal.

SIR: In answer to your letter of May 12, 1910, relative to the claim of W. W. Blood, of Greenville, Cal., for work alleged to have been done at the Indian school at that place, 1907, you are advised that in November, 1909, Supervisor Harwood Hall was directed by this office to investigate and report relative to this claim.

On November 30, 1909, Supervisor Hall reported favorably upon the two items, one of $330 and the other $109.09. So it shows that in February, 1908, within six months, the claim was filed, application made to the department, and Commissioner Valentine stated that they immediately sent a man out to investigate; that he did investigate, approved the claim, and then they said they had not the money to pay it, and that the only thing to do was to apply to Congress in order to get the money. So there has not been one day intervening that there has not been some activity, some effort, to collect the claim.

Mr. MADDEN. I got the impression that the gentleman who did the work did not make any claim until two years after it was completed.

Mr. RAKER. He made his claim within less than six months after the work was done. It shows the date of it here.

Mr. MADDEN. Did he have a contract with the Government of the United States?

Mr. RAKER. He says so in his affidavit.

Mr. MADDEN. Who authorized it?

Mr. RAKER. I suppose the Indian Office, as they always do. That is not set out here, except his affidavit that he furnished this and in regard to the understanding with the superintendent of the schools.

Mr. MADDEN. And the superintendent of schools had no authority to order payment?

Mr. RAKER. There was not any money to pay the man when he had completed the work.

Mr. MADDEN. Was there any money when he began the work?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; and there was sufficient in the fund, if it had not been converted back into the Treasury of the United States under the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly take the committee into his confidence and give us the authority for stating that this claimant presented a claim in 1908?

Mr. RAKER. Certainly. I never proceed with a body of men at any time without taking them into my confidence.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman give us the authority for the statement that the man presented his claim in 1908?

Mr. RAKER. I am reading this statement, on page 3 of the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do you mean the statement in the third line?

Mr. RAKER. I am reading it as it appears here.

Mr. STAFFORD. That merely states——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman suspend until I answer his question? I turn back to the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the attorney general of the State of California, stating that this man did make his claim, and that in 1908 he directed a full investigation of the facts.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will you kindly refer us to any line which confirms that statement that anyone connected with the Indian Service in 1908 directed an investigation of this claim?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. Now I will read for the benefit of the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. Not for my benefit——

Mr. RAKER. Then why did you ask it?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read this report, and I do not find any such statement.

Mr. RAKER. I supposed the gentleman wanted to know.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman does not want to know, he is trifling with me.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not trifling. The gentleman does not seem to have the information I desire to obtain.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, yes; he does.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly give it?

Mr. RAKER. Surely I will give it. I will read it again for the benefit of the gentleman from Wisconsin; on page 2 of the report, R. G. Valentine, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, writes to the attorney general of the State of California, under date of Washington, June 21, 1910:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, June 21, 1910.

U. S. WEBB, Esq.,
Attorney at Law,
Humboldt Bank Building, San Francisco, Cal.

SIR: In answer to your letter of May 12, 1910, relative to the claim of W. W. Blood, of Greenville, Cal., for work alleged to have been done at the Indian school at that place, 1907, you are advised that in November, 1909, Supervisor Harwood Hall was directed by this office to investigate and report relative to this claim—

Knowing the length of time it takes for correspondence after the bill was passed to the superintendent, it says that he sent it to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and he in turn directed a personal report to be made by the supervisor of this claim. Now, the letter proceeds—

On November 30, 1909, Supervisor Hall reported favorably upon two items, one of $330 and the other of $109.09.

You are further advised that if this office is called upon to make recommendations relative to the justness of this claim, it will report in accordance with the favorable recommendations made by Supervisor Hall, above referred to.

Very respectfully,

R. G. VALENTINE, Commissioner.

From the beginning everyone, from the earliest time he commenced to work, all down along, made a personal investigation; they sent the inspectors there, the superintendent, the commissioner, and Secretary Lane, Mr. Jones, and the prior Secretary—all reported favorably upon the justice of the amount claimed, and that he had actually performed the work and supplied the material.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am still waiting for the direction of the gentleman to that portion of the report that shows that the claimant ever made any claim for this work prior to 1909.

Mr. RAKER. In answer to the gentleman, I will state that this is the earliest date within six months of the time he completed the work.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman in a prior statement to say that the claimant presented it as early as February, 1908.

Mr. RAKER. I stated so, and that is the fact from the report in this case. It is uncontradicted and approved by everyone that this man made his claim and dated it Greenville, Cal., February 1, 1908.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the gentleman bases that statement on what appears on page 3 of the report:

REPORT OF HARWOOD HALL, SUPERVISOR OF INDIAN SCHOOLS.

Subject: Claim of W. W. Blood, of Greenville, Cal., for the sum of $109.09, growing out of labor and material furnished the United States at the Indian School, Greenville, Cal., as follows, viz, bill dated Greenville, Cal., February 1, 1908.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the date of the bill; there is nothing to show that the bill was presented on that date.

Mr. RAKER. That is the common, ordinary language that our people use in trying to convey thought that means something, and not in a technical, finespun statement that means nothing. If the gentleman will read again, he will find that the reports in these claims were dated in 1909.

Mr. STAFFORD. We are not questioning their being presented in 1909, but we say there is nothing in the report to show that the claim was presented until more than two years had expired after the work was claimed to have been done and the material furnished.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, yes; I think there is.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I call the gentleman's attention to page 5, a statement of Mr. Jones, Acting Secretary of the Interior. It says:

This claim is for work done and material furnished at the Greenville Indian School, California, in the year 1907, under an informal agreement between the claimant and the superintendent of the school, concerning which a controversy arose between them.

Can the gentleman state to the committee what the informality was and what it lacked to be a legal binding contract? I have heard no explanation.

Mr. RAKER. I understand that it was an informal contract, the employment by the superintendent of Mr. Blood to do this work.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman know whether the superintendent had authority to make such a contract, and if there was a failure what was the failure?

Mr. RAKER. I think he had the authority. The only reason that he was not paid was that before the payment, and while the claim was being investigated by the department, the money appropriated for this work had been covered into the Treasury.

Mr. SLOAN. This says it was an informal agreement, and I should like very much to know, if it can be ascertained, what that informality was, whether it was one of these contracts that contractors sometimes enter into because they want to do business for the public, expecting the public to be lenient in the matter of making payment.

Mr. RAKER. No; I do not think so.

The full report on this claim and the record is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2209) for the relief of W. W. Blood, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

The reports made by the Committee on Claims, Sixty-second Congress, third session, and Sixty-third Congress, third session, together with a letter from the Secretary of the Department of the Interior, are hereto appended and made a part of this report.

[House Report No. 317, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1515) for the relief of W. W. Blood, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

Appended hereto is report No. 1309, Sixty-second Congress, third session, also letters from the Department of the Interior, together with the supervisor's report, which are adopted as and made a part of this report.

[House Report No. 1309, Sixty-second Congress, third session.]

This is a claim by Mr. W. W. Blood, of Greenville, Cal., for labor and material rendered in certain construction work at the Greenville Indian School in California in the year 1907, viz:

For digging a reservoir ditch and laying and covering a pipe 2,200 feet long, at 15 cents per foot	$330.00
Lumber	33.99
335 pressed brick, at 6 cents	20.10
Labor rebuilding furnace in the laundry	22.50
Sand and clay	7.50
Moving bell from top of building and erecting frame and putting bell on same	25.00
Total	439.09

In November, 1909, the Indian Bureau directed Supervisor Harwood Hall to investigate as to the merits of this claim, and, after a most thorough personal inspection, he found that Mr. Blood actually performed the work and furnished the material, as above set forth, in a satisfactory manner, from which the Government benefited, and that the claim is an equitable and just one.

The Interior Department also recommends favorable consideration of this claim.

Appended hereto are letters from the Department of the Interior and other communications and papers, which are made a part of this report:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, August 9, 1911.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have your letter of July 31, 1911, addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, requesting the use of documents on file in the Indian Office concerning the claim of W. W. Blood for work alleged to have been done by him at the Indian school, Greenville, Cal., and inclosing copy of H. R. 12502, for the relief of W. W. Blood; also requesting recommendation on the claim of Mr. Blood.

In November, 1909, Supervisor Harwood Hall was directed by the Indian Office to investigate and report relative to this claim. On November 30, 1909, he reported favorably upon two items—one of $330 and the other of $109.09—amounting to the sum of $439.09.

In view of the facts as developed by the investigation made, it appears Blood actually performed work and furnished material, from which the Government benefited, and that he has an equitable claim. Under the circumstances, this department recommends that H. R. 12502 receive favorable consideration of the Congress.

Copies of the papers pertaining to this claim are herewith inclosed.

Respectfully,

SAMUEL ADAMS,
Acting Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, June 21, 1910.

U. S. WEBB, Esq.,
Attorney at Law,
Humboldt Bank Building, San Francisco, Cal.

SIR: In answer to your letter of May 12, 1910, relative to the claim of W. W. Blood, of Greenville, Cal., for work alleged to have been done at the Indian school at that place, 1907, you are advised that in November, 1909, Supervisor Harwood Hall was directed by this office to investigate and report relative to this claim. On November 30, 1909, Supervisor Hall reported favorably upon two items, one of $330 and the other of $109.09.

You are further advised that if this office is called upon to make recommendations relative to the justness of this claim, it will report in accordance with the favorable recommendations made by Supervisor Hall, above referred to.

Very respectfully,

R. G. VALENTINE,
Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 28, 1910.

W. W. BLOOD, Esq.,
Greenville, Cal.

SIR: The office has received a report from Harwood Hall, supervisor of Indian schools, relative to your claims of $330 and $109.09 for materials and labor furnished the Greenville School, California, during the fiscal year 1907.

You are advised that inasmuch as the balance of the fund from which these expenditures are payable, viz, "Indian school buildings, 1907," has been returned to the Treasury, this office is not in a position to approve your claims. Therefore the only recourse you have in the matter is by congressional action.

Very respectfully,

C. F. HAUKE,
Chief Clerk.

REPORT OF HARWOOD HALL, SUPERVISOR OF INDIAN SCHOOLS.

Subject: Claim of W. W. Blood, of Greenville, Cal., for the sum of $109.09, growing out of labor and material furnished the United States at the Indian school, Greenville, Cal., as follows, viz, bill dated Greenville, Cal., February 1, 1908:

United States to W. W. Blood, Dr.—
Lumber	$33.99
335 pressed brick, at 6 cents	20.10
Labor, rebuilding furnace in the laundry	22.50
Sand and clay	7.50
Moving bell from top of building and erecting frame and putting bell on same	25.00
	109.09

NOVEMBER 30, 1909.

SECTION 1.

Lumber: I have made all possible inquiries with regard to the lumber alleged to have been delivered to this school by W. W. Blood, and from all testimony procurable I find that he actually did have same hauled; that the lumber was used by Charles Falding, who was engaged by the superintendent in repairing the 14 chimneys, as evidenced by voucher 12, fourth quarter, 1907, there being $290 paid to the said Charles Falding for his services and materials in making said repairs to chimneys at the Greenville Indian School, and that such lumber, the property of W. W. Blood, was left at the school and used in small lots by the school.

Material and labor for furnace: I have also ascertained that W. W. Blood did actually use 335 pressed brick, furnished labor, sand, and clay with which he did build a brick furnace at the Indian School, Greenville, Cal.

Morning bell: There is no question but what W. W. Blood constructed a bell tower upon which he placed the school bell, there being remnants of the tower now in the scrap pile. The bell was afterwards placed upon the main building in a more advantageous position.

From observation, inquiries, and testimony submitted there seems to be no question with regards to there being due W. W. Blood the amount of his claim, $109.09.

HARWOOD HALL, Supervisor.

Affidavits and certificate attached.

REPORT OF HARWOOD HALL, SUPERVISOR OF INDIAN SCHOOLS.

Subject: Claim of W. W. Blood, Greenville, Cal., for $330 for excavating a 2,200-foot trench, etc., viz:

United States to W. W. Blood, Dr.—

To labor furnished the Greenville Indian School in 1907, to wit, digging ditch from the upper reservoir and putting in pipe and covering the same, 2,200 feet, at 15 cents per foot $330

NOVEMBER 30, 1909.

SECTION 2.

In company with the industrial teacher and laborer I made a most thorough and complete inspection of the two reservoirs and measured the distance between them and found that the distance is actually 2,625 feet. The pipe line is 2,625 feet, 25 feet at the lower end not being covered. The digging of the trench is well worth $330 as rocks, soil, and roots through which the trench had to be dug was very difficult digging. By reference to cash voucher No. 2, third quarter 1907, I find that W. W. Blood was paid $2,975 for furnishing 1,200 feet of 3½-inch pipe. In addition to this he increased the capacity of the reservoir by raising the retaining wall 3½ feet, furnished 18 feet of 4-inch pipe, 42 feet 10-inch pipe, 85 feet 2-inch pipe, and one 2-inch gate value, besides rocking up the side of the trench when it passed over a gully.

It seems to me that according to the records, testimony submitted, as well as the condition of the work at this day, W. W. Blood has a true claim for the amount of $330.

Affidavits attached.

HARWOOD HALL, Supervisor.

GREENVILLE, CAL., November 30, 1909.

We, the undersigned, do solemnly swear that we worked for W. W. Blood in enlarging the reservoir at the Greenville Indian School, and also performed the work in laying the pipe line between the upper reservoir and lower reservoir, and also excavated the trench in which we laid the pipe; that the said W. W. Blood actually did raise the retaining wall 3½ feet, when it was our understanding that his agreement called for only 1½ feet; that he at all times directed us to do good work and fully in accordance with the agreement; that he did more than he agreed to do and that the capacity of the reservoir was made at least one-fourth greater than the said agreement called for; that we declare our entire disinterestedness in this matter.

GREENVILLE, CAL., November 30, 1909.

I, Fred Farrar, do solemnly swear that I sold to W. W. Blood, on October 30, 1906. 2,234 feet of lumber for the Greenville Indian School, costing $33.99, as taken from my books; that I have no interest in this matter.

FRED FARRAR.

GREENVILLE, CAL., November 30, 1909.

I, Joseph Corderoy, do solemnly swear that I hauled for W. W. Blood 2,734 feet of lumber to the Indian school, Greenville, Cal., on October 30 and November 1, 1906; that I have no interest in this matter.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 30th day of November, 1909.
J. R. MURRAY, Notary Public.

GREENVILLE, CAL., November 30, 1909.

I, W. W. Blood, do solemnly swear that I agreed to furnish 1,200 feet of 3½-inch pipe and connect same with the pipe on the ground between the upper and lower reservoir at the Indian school, Greenville, Cal., also to raise the retaining wall of reservoir 1½ feet, and that I was to receive therefor the sum of $2,975; that I did furnish 1,200 feet of 3½-inch pipe, also 18 feet of 4-inch, 42 feet of 10-inch, and 85 feet of 2-inch pipe; that I started at the upper reservoir with 4-inch pipe, then reduced to 3½-inch (1,200 feet), then 3-inch, then 2½-inch, then 2-inch. The 10-inch pipe was put in at a point necessitating a large capacity, owing to the topography of the ground; that, in addition to the furnishing of 1,200 feet of 3½-inch pipe and other sizes, as heretofore set forth, and raising the reservoir, I excavated a trench or ditch 18 inches deep and 14 inches wide for a distance of 2,600 feet; that I laid the pipe in said trench and covered it with earth; that I not only filled my contract to the letter but dug the trench and raised reservoir dam 3½ feet instead of 1½ feet, as agreed, but also gave more pipe than I agreed, as well as one 1-inch gate valve; that the statement of George W. Wimberly that the distance between reservoirs is only 1,600 feet is false; that I filled the contract honorably and most thoroughly; that I took up 85 feet of 1¼-inch pipe at the lower end of the pipe line and did substitute 2-inch pipe instead; that I was not bound to do so, as I had furnished 1,200 feet of 3½-inch pipe and laid same, it being understood that I was to use the best of the old pipe line in order to complete the entire distance between the reservoirs, which I did; that Wimberly complained of there being a small stretch of 1¼-inch pipe which had been a part of the old line. However, I took up 85 feet of 1¼-inch pipe, all there was, and substituted and furnished at my expense 85 feet of 2-inch pipe in lieu thereof; that the entire length of the pipe line from upper to lower reservoirs is actually 2,625 feet instead of 1,600, as alleged by Wimberly; that there is justly and honestly due me $330 for excavating a 2,600-foot trench; that no part of same has been paid.

W. W. BLOOD.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 31, 1913.

Hon. EDWARD POU,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. POU: I am in receipt of a letter, dated May 9, 1913, from Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, inclosing a copy of H. R. 1515, being a bill for the relief of W. W. Blood, with the request that a report be made thereon to the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives.

This claim is for work done and material furnished at the Greenville Indian School, Cal., in the year 1907, under an informal agreement between the claimant and the superintendent of the school, concerning which a controversy arose between them.

A supervisor in the Indian Service, after investigation, reported November 30, 1909, that the claimant actually furnished material and performed work to the value of $439.09, the sum proposed to be paid by this bill. A copy of this report is inclosed for your information. (See Rept. 1309, supra.)

January 28, 1910, the Indian Office wrote Mr. Blood as follows:

"The office has received a report from Harwood Hall, supervisor of Indian schools, relative to your claims of $300 and $109.09 for materials and labor furnished the Greenville School, Cal., during the fiscal year 1907.

"You are advised that inasmuch as the balance of the fund from which these expenditures are payable, viz, 'Indian school buildings, 1907,' has been returned to the Treasury, this office is not in a position to approve your claims. Therefore, the only recourse you have in the matter is by congressional action."

Reporting upon a similar bill, H. R. 12502, this department recommended August 9, 1911, that it receive favorable consideration. (Copy inclosed.)

It appears that Mr. Blood has an equitable claim for work and material furnished, which can not be paid without authority from Congress, because the unexpended balance of the appropriation, which might have been used, has been covered into the Treasury under the provisions of section 3600, Revised Statutes.

Very truly, yours,

A. A. JONES, Acting Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 21, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. POU: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of January 5, 1916, addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, requesting copies of correspondence relative to claim of W. W. Blood, and opinion as to its merits, for use in connection with bill H. R. 2209, Sixty-fourth Congress, introduced for his relief.

In reply I have the honor to call your attention to department report, dated September 23, 1914, with reference to H. R. 1515, and to prior reports and documents which are included in the printed record of the case. I believe that these will furnish you with all material facts connected with the claim.

In its reports the department has uniformly recommended favorable action on the bills, allowing Mr. Blood the sum of $439.09, and I see no reason now to recommend otherwise.

The bill is returned herewith.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary.

Hon. E. W. POU,
Chairman Committee on Claims,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a meritorious claim, but it ought to be explained why it should be paid. The gentleman from California has so confused the House in regard to it that I shall briefly state what the facts are, which have not yet been stated.

Mr. Blood had a regular contract for doing this work at this Indian school, for which he has been paid the entire contract amount. During the performance of the contract the superintendent at the school desired some extra work done in the way of pipe laying, and he made an informal contract with Mr. Blood, almost in the nature of extras, and Mr. Blood did the work.

After the work was done, when they came to settle up on the original contract and for the extra work, the superintendent and Mr. Blood did not agree as to how much should be paid Mr. Blood for the extra work he had done. The matter was left to an Indian supervisor, who went on the ground and made an examination, but that examination was somewhat delayed, and the report of the supervisor as to the amount of the value to the Government of the work done by Mr. Blood as extra did not get around in time to be audited and paid out of the appropriation which was available in the Indian Department until after the lapse of two years, and, under the application of the so-called covering-in act, the money had been paid back into the Treasury. The amount now involved is recommended by the supervisor as a fair and reasonable amount for the Government to pay for value received. Mr. Blood probably could not have brought a suit in the Court of Claims, because this agreement was not in accordance with the provisions of law. It was a mere informal agreement, and it is very likely that he did not know any better, and it is also quite likely that the Indian superintendent, being one of those in the Indian Office, did not know any better either.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I have just looked over the bills that have been passed this afternoon, and it turns back the clock of memory some 10 years, because, with the exception of one bill which confers authority on the Court of Claims, there is not a bill correctly drawn and not one of them would take a dollar out of the Treasury. When I first served in the Fifty-ninth Congress, I introduced a bill in the defective form that is used in most of these bills. Through the kindness of my colleagues I got it through the House. It went through the Senate and was signed by the President. Then the person in whose favor it was went up to the Treasury only to find that I had simply conferred a distinction upon her, for I think it was a woman, by having her name included among the private bills of the House.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman kindly advise me and the committee what addition should be made here so that we can get the money if the bill should ever get through?

Mr. BENNET. I do not know whether I will or not. I am not in favor of the bill. I am not the Clerk at the Speaker's table or anything of that sort. I am not here under any authority to instruct the gentleman from California, and I think he is a better lawyer than I am. I want just to call the attention of the committee to one or two matters in respect to this bill. In all my acquaintance with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I have never seen him in such a kind mood in relation to the matter, because if there ever was a bill before Congress that had every possible defect, this bill for the relief of W. W. Blood is that bill.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think it ought to have one supporter on the floor who knows something about it? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I just alluded to the kindness of the present disposition of the gentleman from Illinois, and commented upon it. I realize that it ought to have one supporter, and I know that the gentleman's kindness of heart has induced him to overlook all the defects, and he is supporting the bill because somebody ought to allude to the equities.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman means to say that he has overlooked all of his ordinary defects?

Mr. BENNET. Whose ordinary defects?

Mr. MADDEN. Those of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, he has no ordinary defects. All his defects are extraordinary [laughter], as are his qualities. What are the defects in this bill? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in the days when our party was in power, as it frequently is, and will be again after the 4th of March, 1917, was a favorite presiding officer over the Committee of the Whole, and about the Fifty-seventh or the Fifty-eighth Congress he ruled upon the question of the construction of buildings on a Government reservation. That ruling is one of the monuments of parliamentary law in the House. At that time he ruled that you can not construct a building without an authorization from Congress. As I recall it, the ruling was on a rather small amount, the building of a wall in a navy yard, something of that character. But that is the law. The ruling is that the construction of a building on a Government reservation is not the continuation of a work in progress, and requires special authorization.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois, who knows more about parliamentary law and statute law, I think, than all of us put together, was quite correct in his statement that if this man is to get any money he has got to go to Congress. Why? Because, in the first place, the building itself, so far as any evidence before this committee is concerned, was never authorized; second, the contract for the building, even though the building was unauthorized, was never properly made; and third, there were never any proper vouchers presented in the form required in order to get money out of the United States Treasury, and yet the gentleman from Illinois approves this bill. Why, after this, after the mentor of the House has done that, God save the Treasury of the United States; the rest of us will not.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has constantly referred to this building—this building. He says this building was not authorized. Does the gentleman understand this claim is for a building?

Mr. BENNET. It is in part for a bell tower.

Mr. MANN. No——

Mr. BENNET. As the gentleman will find on page 3 of the report—

> There is no question but what W. W. Blood constructed a bell tower upon which he placed the school bell——

Mr. MANN. Upon the top of the building.

Mr. BENNET. He constructed a tower, but the gentleman from Illinois held way back in the Fifty-seventh Congress that the building of a wall in a navy yard was not a continuation of a public work in progress. I think the gentleman was right.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think this man constructed a bell tower for $25?

Mr. BENNET. Well, if the gentleman will let me read the rest of the language, I think he will agree with me that that is all the tower is worth. [Laughter.] It says:

> There is no question but what W. W. Blood constructed a bell tower upon which he placed the school bell, there being remnants of the tower now in the scrap pile.

[Laughter.]

It must have been a swell tower that the gentleman is now attempting to get money out of the Treasury of the United States for.

Mr. MANN. Is that the building to which the gentleman has reference?

Mr. BENNET. It is the building for which the gentleman from Illinois is trying to get this man out in California paid.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was referring to a ruling which I once made on the subject of buildings, and I just wanted to know if the gentleman really thinks that putting up logs for a bell tower is a building.

Mr. BENNET. Well, under the ruling of the gentleman from Illinois, I think it is. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I think I went quite a ways, probably, in protecting the Treasury from the onslaughts of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, but I never went that far.

Mr. BENNET. It was not the Brooklyn Navy Yard at that time.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. Does not the gentleman think the statute of limitations would run against those rulings of the leader on this side?

Mr. BENNET. The statute of limitations never runs against the gentleman from Illinois or any of his rulings. They only improve by time; but I am just simply calling his attention to what he rules. He never rules in jest. He is a very serious man in the chair and on the floor.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think he is going to change the mind of the gentleman from Illinois by calling his attention to his rulings?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the mind of the gentleman from Illinois is all right. He is just being led away by his heart. He explained the reason. He said somebody ought to be for this bill and he is being "it." I am not defending him. He can not justify his being for a building that was illegally constructed, improperly contracted for, and as to which there are no vouchers.

Mr. MADDEN. And which is in the scrap pile.

Mr. BENNET. And which is now in the scrap pile.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman contending there was no building at all?

Mr. BENNET. There was a building.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was there a bell?

Mr. BENNET. Of course there was a bell.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What became of the bell and the building?

Mr. BENNET. I will tell the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman ought to read the whole report; he ought not to keep anything to himself.

Mr. BENNET. It says, "The bell was afterwards placed upon the main building in a more advantageous position." I should think any position would be more advantageous than on top of a tower which is in the scrap heap.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what we are asked to pay $109 for?

Mr. BENNET. Surely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One other question. Is the gentleman from New York endeavoring to make as much haste in opposing this bill as the gentleman from California did in presenting it?

Mr. BENNET. Why, I think the gentleman from California was reasonably diligent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Did it look like part of the belfry or part of the building in the scrap heap?

Mr. BENNET. No; it was a tower. The gentleman, if he reads his Bible, will find out what a tower is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Was the tower built from the ground up or from the top of a building?

Mr. KING. Was it a belfry or a bell tower?

Mr. BENNET. It was not a belfry or a bell hop, but a bell tower, and all that is left of it is the scrap.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman explain whether the tower is a part of the building or the building is a part of the tower?

Mr. BENNET. When the gentleman has been here long enough, he will not think——

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is the bellwether?

Mr. BENNET. No; there was not anything about it except scrap, and this is the most recent scrap in connection with it. [Laughter.] I will answer the gentleman on my right, who asked me if I did not think this was a belfry. I remember when I came here to Congress I heard this House discuss for two days the question as to whether a brass field gun was fortifications or not, and I think they finally determined that a brass field gun on wheels was a fort. Now, if the gentleman thinks, after that determination of this House, I am going to pass on the question offhand as to whether this particular construction was a belfry or not, he is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Can I have five minutes more?

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman ought to get along with less than five minutes. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET. I have been interrupted so much that——

Mr. MANN. I will make it three minutes.

Mr. BENNET. Give me five.

Mr. MANN. Well, I yield to the gentleman five minutes, but I think we ought to get along and pass some of these bills. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's attempt to expedite the business of the House. [Laughter.] Therefore I will not take an hour of my own time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is one point which the gentleman overlooked in section 1, under the head of "Lumber." There were 14 chimneys on these buildings, and if the gentleman will tell us about them he can entertain the House for five minutes more.

Mr. BENNET. It could not have been a belfry with 14 chimneys on it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was the lumber only that went to the scrap heap?

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I will.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to say that under the grace of my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. BENNET] whatever may be said of the merits of the bill, the exhibition of wit and humor made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is worth the money, and we ought to pay it; and the exhibition made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], my good old friend over there, ought to justify us in paying interest on the amount. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I will accept the compliment if the gentleman will amend by withdrawing the word "old." I do not know of anybody on this side of the Chamber who is old.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, that is the term of endearment.

Mr. BENNET. I will accept it, therefore, in toto.

Mr. MANN. We are more particular than they are over there. They act more like children than old men.

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not endeavor to intimate that either of the two gentlemen from Illinois was in his second childhood.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman could not prove it, even if he intimated it.

Mr. MANN. We will admit it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I will tell the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] what I think is the trouble with his bill. It does not appropriate any money out of the Treasury. There are other defects which I have casually mentioned in passing; but if he gets his bill through, unless he changes the language, he has no appropriation, and this is absolutely serious. I had that done to me 10 years ago, and as long as I was in Congress before I never let a bill go through without changing the law so that if it did pass it appropriated money. And it got so that they called that amendment the Bennet amendment. It is the only thing I ever had called after me, except a 5-cent cigar. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. If you will allow this bill to pass as it is, I will run the risk of Mr. Blood getting the money.

Mr. BENNET. If the gentleman legislates in that way, all right. I will give him fair warning. Either he will have to pass it again out of the Claims Committee or else go to the Committee on Appropriations and have it put on a deficiency bill. It is not an appropriation bill. It is an authorization bill, and the Comptroller of the Treasury ruled to that effect in the case of the bill that I had passed.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman's bill evidently was not so tightly drawn as this bill is.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, it was better than this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one serious question?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman's suggestions were carried out and we should authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay this $439, would it not go out to the country that the Secretary of the Treasury did not have this $439 with which to make the payment? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. Oh, I am a pretty strong partisan, but I do not think I should want to say that. We could give a note, at least, and a Government bond is good at any time and anywhere. That is one of the reasons why the bill ought not to be passed in its present shape. There are several other reasons, but I gave the gentleman a reason why we ought not to follow the generous lead of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who allows his heart and his sympathies and sentiments to run away with him, and to pay out of the Treasury of the United States this $439 of hard-earned money. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Secretary of the Treasury would have to pay it?

Mr. BENNET. It makes it a personal liability.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] moves to lay aside the bill with a favorable recommendation. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. POU. I hope the gentleman will withhold that point. I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MADDEN. All right.

Mr. POU. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee now rise and report to the House the bills which have been laid aside, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD touching some communications I have from Texas on the question of preparedness and my replies thereto on the question of national defense.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that that committee, having had under consideration House bills 1584, 2209, 3896, 4881, 6180, and 7502, had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

SATURDAY, February 19, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We come before Thee, Almighty God, lifting up our hearts in supplication and prayer, seeking the influence of Thy spirit upon us that we may discharge the duties of this day. Thou hast given to these Thy servants the important task of interpreting Thy will and translating it into the forms of human law. Thy will controls and governs the universe. We pray that they may be enabled so to interpret Thy will in the terms of human law that they may achieve the prosperity of the people and insure the permanency of our institutions. Give to us Thy blessing and Thy guidance. Hear us in this our morning prayer. Forgive our sins. For Christ's sake. Amen.

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE,

"Whereas the tax upon inheritance has been regarded as strictly and naturally a source of State revenue; and

RELIEF OF FLOOD SUFFERERS.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator says it is a joint resolution?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will have to go to a committee.

Mr. BROUSSARD. If unanimous consent is granted for its consideration, I presume it will not have to go to a committee; and I believe unanimous consent will be granted after the joint resolution has been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The SECRETARY. Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 101) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan, issue, or use quartermaster's and medical supplies for the relief of destitute persons in the district overflowed by the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and making an appropriation therefor.

Mr. SMOOT. That joint resolution should go to the committee.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I beg that the Senator will permit me to read a telegram and to make a statement with regard to the conditions in Louisiana at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I am fully aware of the conditions. I will also say that if there is urgency in the matter the joint resolution can be referred to the committee, and he no doubt can have the committee act upon it to-day; but this joint resolution, like all other joint resolutions, ought to go to a committee.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will state to the Senator that the joint resolution which was adopted by the Senate the other day does not provide any appropriation, and the Acting Secretary of War tells me this morning that the department can not comply with it.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator that he ask to have the resolution referred to the committe, and I have no doubt the committee will report it back in half an hour or so if it is an urgency matter.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the Senator mean that it will be reported to-day?

Mr. SMOOT. Has the joint resolution been reported from a committee?

Mr. BROUSSARD. No; it has not.

Mr. SMOOT. Has it ever been referred to a committee?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It has never been referred to a committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I object, Mr. President. It ought to go to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce. I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The amendment was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. NEWLANDS to the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, viz: Insert at the end of the bill the following:

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,497.44 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to reimburse Benson County, N. R. 10385), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

ARMOR PLATE.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a copy of the Manufacturers' Record, a paper of very great influence and wide circulation. It has a very interesting and instructive article on armor plate. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection.

Mr. JONES. I suggest that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] should be sent for. I myself have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no power to send for the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why send for the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STONE entered the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri is here.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have the article printed in the RECORD without reading. Is it necessary to read it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading?

Mr. LODGE. The only objection is to taking the time; that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE ARMOR-PLATE QUESTION AND THE RELATION OF THE GOVERNMENT AND THE ARMOR PLATE MAKERS.

The official announcement of the Bethlehem Steel Co., through its Washington representative to the Manufacturers' Record, that this company will, with a view to the amortization of the investment in its armor plant, advance its price for armor plate if the Government builds an armor-plate plant is one of the most unfortunate statements ever issued in this country by any great businesses organization dealing with the Government.

It is a statement of a fact rather than a threat, but the statement necessarily becomes a threat.

It is an effort to prevent the National Government from building an armor-plate plant.

We trust that other armor-plate concerns do not propose to take such a step; but if they do, they will be in every respect equally as deserving of criticism.

The Bethlehem Co. is the only one from which we have an official statement as to its intention.

From every point of view this action is, we believe, unwise and shows a lack of judgment which few people in this country would have been willing to charge to the men who have created the great Bethlehem Co.

In this case they have shown a narrowness of vision and a disregard of public sentiment lamentable in the extreme. They have illustrated in this case how great concerns sometimes, viewing matters only from one standpoint, make blunders in dealing with the public so bad that one wonders at their lack of understanding of public sentiment and appreciation of the value of public good will.

It is to such blunders as this that much of the hostility in this country to great corporations is due. Such blunders have cost great corporations far more than they can ever understand or realize. Blunders such as this have been responsible for much of the anarchistic and socialistic sentiment which has found expression in legislation, State and National, antagonistic to corporations.

They are on a par with that fatal blunder made by the Pennsylvania Railroad some years ago, when, because of its fight with the Gould interests, it ruthlessly cut down the poles of the Western Union Telegraph Co. along its lines. The excuse of the Pennsylvania Co. was that it was within its legal rights, but that road and others paid a fearful penalty for its unwise act.

The armor-plate companies will be within their legal rights if they follow the plan given to the Manufacturers' Record by the Washington representative of the Bethlehem Co., but legal rights and sound business sense may sometimes be millions of miles apart, as in this case. We trust that other armor-plate making concerns will not follow the unwise lead of the Bethlehem Co. If they do, they will be freely entitled to the same criticism which we are now, much to our regret, extending to our good personal friends of the Bethlehem Co. The men at the head of that company are too big, too broad as constructive upbuilders, to have made such a mistake. They should have been wise enough to know that nothing that they could do would create greater hostility to their work than this statement, and that any action such as they propose of advancing the price of armor plate would in itself be regarded as a threat which the Government would be pusillanimous in the extreme if it did not meet by building an armor plant and thus demonstrate that individual corporations, however great, can not and should not be permitted to dominate the National Government.

The Bethlehem Co. could not have taken any stand whatever which would have more surely aroused a determination on the part of the Government to build an armor-plate plant than this statement as to its proposed increase of prices. It is scarcely conceivable that men at the head of this great organization could have intelligently considered the subject in all of its bearings before they decided on a plan such as this. And the statement which we publish is, we are advised, officially authorized by the company itself.

This situation developed by this action practically compels the Government to build an armor-plate plant or to exercise its right to commandeer one. It can not permit itself to be browbeaten. It would cease to be worthy of public respect if it did. But in considering the building of a plant it would be worse than folly for the Government to build it in any portion of the country dependent upon foreign or Lake Superior ores, upon which all our armor-plate concerns now rely.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have a short memorandum consisting of four pages, a digest of expression of opinion on the subject of equal suffrage. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHERE WOMEN VOTE.

Equal suffrage is not a new and untried experiment. Women can already vote for President of the United States in Kansas, Illinois, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Idaho, Arizona, Montana, Nevada, Washington, Oregon, and California, and for all the elective officers in the Territory of Alaska.

In Illinois they have also municipal suffrage, and a vote upon all questions submitted to the electors. They have a vote on bonding propositions in Iowa; and they have school suffrage in Kentucky, Michigan, Minnesota, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Vermont, Nebraska, North and South Dakota, Oklahoma, New Jersey, Illinois, Connecticut, Ohio, Delaware, Wisconsin, and New Mexico. In Louisiana, in Michigan, and in all the towns and villages of New York State women who are taxpayers may vote on various questions of local taxation.

SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT WORLD WIDE.

Women also have full suffrage in Norway, Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Bosnia, New Zealand, and Australia; and municipal suffrage in England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Canada, Sweden, and a number of districts in Europe, South Africa, and India. In France women engaged in trade vote for judges of the tribunals of commerce; in the Kingdom of Wurtemberg women engaged in farming vote for members of the chamber of agriculture; and in Belgium women vote for the conseils des prudhommes.

WILL WOMEN VOTE?

It is sometimes said that women do not want to vote. The only test ever applied to men to see whether they want to vote or not is the size of the vote they actually cast. Where women have the ballot, they use it.

At the presidential election of 1912, there were 24,773,583 men over 21 years of age in the States where women could not vote. Of these 12,521,899 voted, or 54.5 per cent. In the six equal-suffrage States, Colorado, California, Wyoming, Utah, Idaho, and Washington, the only States were women could vote for President in 1912, there were 3,253,443 men and women over 21 years of age. Of these, 1,514,643 voted, or 56.6 per cent. These figures are from impartial sources—the United States census and the New York World Almanac.

Between the proportion of men voting in the male-suffrage States and the proportion of all adults voting in the equal-suffrage States, there was a difference of less than 8 per cent. Either the women in the suffrage States voted almost as generally as the men or the men in the suffrage States voted much more generally than the men throughout the rest of the country. There is no escape from this conclusion.

VOTE SHOWS GREAT INCREASE.

Striking proof that women do vote is also to be found in the figures of the State elections.

Kansas, Oregon, and Arizona gave women the ballot in November, 1912, and the women had their first chance to vote at a general election in November, 1914. In Arizona the total vote cast rose from 23,722 in 1912 to 51,007 in 1914; in Oregon, from 137,040 to 216,566; and in Kansas, from 365,444 to 530,206. The increase is the more remarkable inasmuch as 1912 was a presidential year.

California elects her governor once in four years. In 1911 she enfranchised her women. The total vote cast at the gubernatorial election in 1906 was 312,030; in 1910, 385,715; and in 1914, 926,689. These figures speak for themselves.

Neither do women lose their interest after the novelty wears off. In New Zealand the women's vote has grown at each triennial parliamentary election. In 1893, 90,290 women voted; in 1896, 108,783; in 1899, 119,550; in 1902, 138,565; in 1905, 175,046; in 1908, 190,114; and in 1911, 221,858.

In Australia, too, the women's vote has grown at each successive federal election. In 1913 (the last year for which we have the figures), 78.22 per cent of the men voted and 71.54 per cent of the women.

In Chicago alone at the first election in which women could vote for mayor more than 250,000 women cast their ballots.

TESTIMONY FROM THOSE WHO KNOW.

Gov. Dunne, of Illinois, says:

"Will women vote? Look at Chicago. Women's votes are a strong influence against corporate greed. If a male vote on the question of equal suffrage were now taken, I believe it would result heavily in favor of the women."

Gov. Joseph M. Carey, of Wyoming, says:

"Woman suffrage in Wyoming for more than 40 years has been in every respect as successful as man suffrage. Woman has not neglected her home duties. It has not caused trouble for husband or children. I know of none who would take the right of suffrage from women."

Gov. Arthur Capper, of Kansas, says:

"The extension of equal suffrage to women is one of the biggest things the men of Kansas have ever done. It has had immediate effect for good. It is cleansing the State of spoilsman politics and is making for higher ideals in both public and private life."

Gov. George A. Carlson, of Colorado, says:

"Let others tell you that the mothers of your children will become coarse or neglectful in the home if given the ballot; those who for nearly a quarter of a century have actually observed the enfranchised woman at work know that she can sense the enemy of the home more quickly and will fight him with more telling effect than the husband; and, while preserving all her natural feminine charm and sweetness, she will become even more devoted to the man who has allowed her ampler means and fuller power for the protection of their common fireside."

Gov. Hiram W. Johnson, of California, writes:

"There is every reason to regard equal suffrage as having justified itself in California. The women have proved themselves a great force for good government."

Gov. Ernest Lister, of Washington, writes:

"The results in this State have certainly indicated that the women assist in public affairs rather than otherwise by having the right to vote. Large numbers of men who were opposed are now in favor."

Gov. George W. P. Hunt, of Arizona, writes:

"Woman suffrage is approved and commended throughout the State except by those who have been unalterably opposed to it from the beginning. None of the alleged evils have been apparent in Arizona."

Gov. Oswald West, of Oregon, writes:

"Results show that equal suffrage is as productive of good as its friends had claimed for it. The women not only register and vote, but they vote for those men and those measures that make for decent government."

Gov. William Spry, of Utah, writes:

"The women of Utah have been exercising the right of suffrage for many years to the advantage of the State, the home, and the women themselves."

Gov. S. V. Stewart, of Montana, says:

"Woman suffrage in our State is a success. All doubt as to whether the women would vote was settled at the first election."

Gov. Moses Alexander, of Idaho, says:

"Equal suffrage has worked well. A proof of this is that in every State where women vote the per capita wealth of the people is above the average for the country at large."

Gov. Strong, of Alaska, says:

"Woman suffrage in Alaska, though but 2 years old, is an unqualified success. The women's votes as a rule are cast on the side of progress and morality. They are exercising the suffrage wisely and well, patriotically, and for the moral uplift of the Territorial citizenship."

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe sent a circular letter of inquiry to all the editors in the oldest four suffrage States and to all the ministers of five denominations. She published the result in the Woman's Journal of October 15, 1910. She got 624 answers, of which only 62 were unfavorable. The replies from the editors were in favor between 8 and 9 to 1; from the Episcopal clergymen, more than 2 to 1; from the Baptist ministers, 7 to 1; from the Congregationalists, about 8 to 1; from the Methodists, more than 10 to 1; and from the Presbyterians, more than 11 to 1.

There is a general agreement that it leads women to take more interest in public questions and makes them more intelligent companions for their husbands, and better able to teach their children the duties of citizenship; also that women generally vote on the right side of moral questions, and that equal suffrage has brought increased attention to the public health and welfare.

Another proof that people are satisfied is that there is no move anywhere to repeal it. Judge Ben B. Lindsey, of the Denver juvenile court, says: "If left to the men of Colorado, any proposition to revoke the right bestowed upon women would be overwhelmingly defeated." State Senator John Hecker, of Colorado, is one of the few men in that State who are strongly opposed to equal suffrage. A report was circulated not long ago that he meant to introduce in the legislature a proposal for its repeal. Senator Hecker at once came out in the Denver papers with a flat denial. He said that he did not believe anyone would introduce such a measure, and added: "Even if introduced, I do not think there is a sane man who believes it would have the ghost of a chance of passing."

In Idaho the chief justice and all the justices of the State supreme court have signed a published statement, saying:

"Woman suffrage has gained much in popularity since its adoption by our people. If the question were resubmitted, it would now be adopted by a vote almost unanimous."

California gave women the ballot in 1911. At that time 121,000 men voted against it, and it was claimed that 80 per cent of the women were opposed also. In 1912 a petition for the repeal of woman suffrage was started under the initiative and referendum. Both men and women were eligible to sign, but the antisuffragists failed to get the 32,000 signatures needed to resubmit the question. One year's experience of equal suffrage had allayed almost all the opposition. The attempt at repeal has never been renewed.

SOME INDORSEMENTS.

Woman suffrage has been indorsed by the National Grange, the National Education Association, the American Federation of Labor, the General Federation of Woman's Clubs, the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and about 600 other organizations.

SOME OPINIONS.

Thomas A. Edison says:

"The woman-suffrage movement means in part reduction of waste, and in part just plain morals."

Luther Burbank says:

"There is not a greater disgrace in the world than that our women should not be allowed to vote."

Dr. Francis E. Clark, president of the United Societies of Christian Endeavor, says:

"I have seen the operation of woman suffrage in various parts of the world, and my belief in it has been strengthened."

Julia C. Lathrop, head of the United States Children's Bureau, says:

"Woman suffrage leads toward child welfare."

Gifford Pinchot says:

"Equal suffrage is coming, as it ought to come."

Louis D. Brandeis says:

"It was the wisdom and action of women in public matters with which I was concerned that converted me to woman suffrage."

Hon. P. P. Claxton, United States Commissioner of Education, says:

"In the larger housekeeping interests of the city, State, and Nation, women have as important a function as in the housekeeping affairs of the smaller world of the home. I believe in the ballot for women on the same terms as for men."

AMERICAN POLICY IN NICARAGUA (S. DOC. NO. 334).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed as a public document a memorandum by Mr. George T. Weitzel, late minister to Nicaragua, in regard to the American policy in Nicaragua. It is a very valuable paper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. KERN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 101), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized to employ an additional clerk, who shall be a stenographer, at a salary of $100 per month, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

UNITED STATES COURT FOR CHINA.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration Order of Business 93, being Senate bill 4014, to supplement existing legislation relative to the United States court for China and to increase the serviceability thereof. The bill relates to the United States court at Shanghai, and I do not think it will take three minutes to have it passed, if I may have the consent of the Senate. It has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the calendar number?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Ninety-three.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Court for China shall possess and exercise the power and jurisdiction to enforce and apply to causes coming before it any and all acts of Congress which may be pertinent or applicable.

SEC. 2. That court fees and costs in such causes, in no case to exceed the amounts fixed by the statutes of the United States for similar services shall be fixed by rules to be framed and promulgated by the judge of said court except that in bankruptcy proceedings the fees and costs shall be those prescribed by the Federal bankruptcy acts now in force. In probate and administration proceedings the clerk of said court shall collect, in addition to the fees prescribed by said rules, special court fees as follows: Where the value of the estate is from $500 to $2,500 United States currency, 2 per cent; from $2,500 to $5,000, 2½ per cent; above $5,000, 3 per cent. For certificate, in either case, $5 United States currency. All sums collected as costs or fees by said clerk shall be deposited to the credit of said court's fund for current expenses and to the extent of the appropriation therefor, shall be subject to use for such expenses, and shall be accounted for by said clerk.

SEC. 3. That reports of the decisions of said court shall be compiled, edited, and published from time to time as they accumulate under the direction of the judge, who may call upon the officers of the court to assist in said work. The expenses of publication for not exceeding 500 copies of any one volume may be defrayed from the court funds, or the said judge, in his discretion, may arrange for their publication with a private publisher. In either case the clerk may dispose of said reports by sale or exchange, the proceeds of any sales to become a part of the court funds.

SEC. 4. That there shall be appointed, as in the district courts of the United States and with similar powers and tenure of office, a United States commissioner for China, who shall be a regularly admitted attorney. He shall be, in addition, ex officio judge of the consular court for the district of Shanghai, and to him shall be transferred all the authority and jurisdiction now exercised by the vice consul general acting by virtue of the act of Congress of March 2, 1909 (35 Stat. L., p. 679).

In case of absence from the jurisdiction, disqualification, or other inability to act on the part of said judge of the United States Court for China, the said United States commissioner shall, in the place and stead of said judge, have jurisdiction to make orders in probate and bankruptcy proceedings and to perform any other act which the said judge is empowered to do in chambers or in vacation. Any of the other officers of said United States Court for China mentioned in this act may, in addition to his other duties, if otherwise qualified, be appointed by the judge thereof as said United States commissioner for the full term, or to act during the illness, absence, or other disability of the regular incumbent; but any person so appointed shall take and subscribe the customary judicial oath before entering upon his duties. In case the said duties are performed by one of the regular court officers, the fees for his services shall be collected and disposed of as provided in section 2 hereof.

SEC. 5. That the United States attorney for China shall give advice on matters of public business to American diplomatic, consular, and other officials in China when so requested by any of them, and perform such other duties appertaining to his office as may be required of him by the judge of said court. He shall not represent private litigants in the United States Court for China.

SEC. 6. That the clerk of said United States Court for China shall also act as clerk of the consular court for the district of Shanghai and shall perform such other duties appertaining to his office as may be required of him by the judge of said court.

SEC. 7. That the United States marshal for China shall be the custodian of all prisoners brought before said court and of all American prisons in China. He shall also act as marshal of the said consular court, and shall perform such other duties appertaining to his office as may be required of him by said judge of the United States court. The marshals of all consular courts in China shall be ex officio deputies of said United States marshal.

The prisoners heretofore mentioned may be confined in a prison maintained or leased by the United States in China, or, after sentence, may be transferred, at the discretion of said judge, to some other suitable and convenient prison situated in a place under the sovereignty of the United States; but a prisoner so transferred shall continue under the jurisdiction of said court until the expiration of his sentence.

SEC. 8. That the judge of said United States court may designate a stenographer of said court, who may also be appointed deputy clerk and deputy marshal thereof and perform such other duties as may be required of him by said judge. The compensation of said stenographer shall be fixed by the judge, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State.

SEC. 9. That all of the officers of said court mentioned in this act shall enjoy the same privileges regarding leaves of absence and allowances as are provided by law for diplomatic and consular officers of the United States. Applications for leave by the judge shall be subject to approval by the Secretary of State. Such applications from the other officers shall be subject to approval by the judge.

SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the word "district" be inserted before the word "attorney," in section 5, page 4, line 7. There is a misprint, resulting in leaving it out. The title of the office is "United States district attorney," and the word "district" has been omitted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the bill by inserting the word "district" before the word "attorney," in section 5, page 4, line 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 54. An act to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China; and POTASH SUPPLY.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk the resolution I intended to offer last evening. I ask that it be read for the information of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution (S. Res. 102) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Bulletin 104, Bureau of Plant Industry, published in 1907, which is entirely exhausted, be reprinted in sufficient quantity for general distribution by the Agricultural Department throughout those regions of the United States where potash is most imperatively needed in agriculture as a fertilizer.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the clipping I send to the desk be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WHY GO TO GERMANY?—PLENTY OF POTASH DEPOSITS IN AMERICA.

To the EDITOR OF THE STATE:

Why is potash selling at $450 per ton when there is enough of it available in the New England States to supply the whole world for many centuries? Who is it that is keeping this fact from becoming generally known, and what is the reason? Our State agricultural colleges well know of this easily available potash supply. They are also well aware, or should be, of its extreme cheapness and solubility for agricultural purposes, for many of them made tests as far back as 1889, and proved without a question the value of this enormous potash supply at our very door.

The Agricultural Department at Washington has made very extensive tests and found that this silicate of potash is soluble in the soil and as easily and quickly available for plant life as the German potash salts. These tests are all scientifically described in Bulletin 104, Bureau of Plant Industry, Agricultural Department, Washington, D. C., entitled "The Use of Feldspathic Rocks as Fertilizers."

In most of the Middle States and a large number of the Southern States there is an inexhaustible supply of potash feldspar that will run from 6 to 15 per cent potash. In the State of Georgia large deposits of potash feldspar can be found in Cherokee, Lumpkin, Rabon, and several other counties. In North Carolina deposits can be found in Alexander, Buncombe, Hickory, Clay, Cleveland, Gaston, Haywood, Mitchell, and many other counties in unlimited quantities.

Prof. Allerton S. Cushman, formerly with the United States Agricultural Department, states in the bulletin above mentioned that the potash in these feldspathic rocks, when ground 200-mesh fine and mixed with the soil, becomes soluble and available for plant life very rapidly. There is scarcely a county in all New England that has not many large deposits of feldspar rock which will analyze from 6 to 12 and 15 per cent potash. The cost of quarrying and pulverizing on a fairly large scale should not exceed $3 to $4 per ton.

I would advise every farmer in this country to send to the Bureau of Plant Industry, Agricultural Department, Washington, and secure a copy of Bulletin 104, if he has any desire to obtain a supply of potash almost for the asking, which is, without question, soluble and available when pulverized as above stated. If he is unable to obtain this valuable bulletin, owing to its being out of print, I would suggest that he make a request, through the Congressman from his district, that another edition be printed immediately by the Government for distribution.

The old doctrine claiming that plant food must be either water soluble or soluble in dilute acids before being mixed with the soil, in order to become quickly available, has long since been exploded. It was always a delusion. The bacteria of the soil do not function or thrive properly except in the presence of an overabundance of inorganic plant food and a liberal amount of humus.

W. N. MCCRILLIS.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, my attention has been called to this bulletin by a correspondent in South Carolina, and I know from experience as well as observation that in the sandy soils of the South potash is a necessary ingredient in any fertilizer for cotton. It is very essential to the prosperity of our country, both there and elsewhere, that any home source of supply of potash should be developed to the fullest extent. We all know the potash used in this country comes from Germany, and the war has shut that off. The feldspathic rock, of which there is any quantity throughout New England and in all the regions south where the primary rocks are found, east of the Blue Ridge, as far down as Alabama, exists in streaks. It has long been known that feldspar has large quantities of potash as one of its ingredients. I myself know of several streaks of nearly pure feldspar in South Carolina embedded in strata of gneiss.

There are rock-crushing establishments all through North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, and these streaks could be mined and the feldspathic rock ground into powder, and thus supply the potash so much needed by the impoverished fields alongside. Just as finely ground phosphate—otherwise called "floats"—in South Carolina, Tennessee, and Florida have come to be very largely used in our agriculture, this feldspathic rock will also enter in, if the farmers are educated to know just what to do with it and how rich it is in potash.

Therefore, I should say at least a hundred thousand copies of Bulletin 104 should be printed as soon as possible and placed in charge of the Agricultural Department, where those who are interested can get the supply needed for their constituents at home.

I found upon applying there that they did not have a single copy, and I had to look for it in one of the bound volumes of bulletins. This happens to be a very valuable bulletin, but, like other valuable bulletins—I know that the Agricultural Department has published some very worthless bulletins, though most of them are valuable—it has not had sufficient distribution. The Agricultural Department has no money with which to print any more, and it would be too long to wait until the annual appropriation bill comes up. Therefore I ask that the Joint Committee on Printing consider this matter and take prompt action.

I have read in the newspapers that kelp, or seaweed, on the Pacific coast is one source of supply of potash, but that is too far away from our portion of the country. Then, too, the freight would be very high. So we could not utilize that source of supply at all. Why need we go anywhere for potash if we have it right at our doors? And I know there is enough feldspar rock all over upper South Carolina, Georgia, and North Carolina to supply the needs for potash of those three States forever. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] tells me there are immense deposits of potash in the Salt Lake Valley. If this be true, then the Government should get busy to develop it. The German Government regulates the export of potash and considers it a valuable treasure to that country, and millions of tons of it were exported until the war came on. I have learned—I do not know how reliable the information is—that there is in the Salt Lake Valley nitrate of potash, too. If this be so, and there is much of it, it would be a very valuable asset to our farmers, at it would supply the nitrogen so much needed for top dressing small grain, and being a fertilizer containing both nitrogen and potash, would be most valuable, if it could be obtained cheaply enough. Of course, every intelligent man in the South knows that nitrogen, or ammonia in some form, phosphoric acid, and potash are the three essential elements in all commercial fertilizers that are worth having; and the State of South Carolina expends millions of dollars every year for these commercial fertilizers.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I would like to state to my colleague that I have exactly the same clipping which he has sent to the desk and had read. I had that clipping sent to the Agricultural Department to ascertain just what were the facts in reference to the bulletin to which reference is made. The department did not go into an explanation as to what the bulletin set forth, I presume on the ground that they did not have a copy of it, but they did send me a very exhaustive report on the possible potash supply of America. Amongst the things mentioned were the kelp beds along the Pacific coast, from which they claim kelp can be gathered and dried, put in commercial form, and delivered at the South Atlantic seaports at about four or five dollars a ton less than the German potash, but they claim that the difficulty of obtaining a supply from that source is by reason of the laws pertaining to gathering the seaweed. Those beds are in the 3-mile limit, which belongs to everybody.

Mr. TILLMAN. And to nobody.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And to nobody; and therefore nobody will go in, for the reason that they fear, I think, that they can not get a monopoly of it, as some of our fertilizer companies have on fertilizer ingredients. The department claims there is quite an extensive deposit of alunite in Utah and in some of the adjoining States, and that it can be put into commercial form, but that the freight rate is such as to make the price prohibitory to the South Atlantic seaboard, where most of the potash is used. I shall at the next meeting of the Senate submit the report of the Agricultural Department made in response to my inquiry as to Bulletin 104.

I was under the impression, as my colleague [Mr. TILLMAN] seems to be, that we have an extensive deposit of potash in the feldspathic rock; feldspar lies all along our Appalachian chain of mountains. I would be glad to have that bulletin printed and to have the matter brought to the attention of the Agricultural Department, because the prime essential with us, as the senior Senator from South Carolina stated, is potash. The whole tobacco crop and the cotton crop on the coastal plain where the sandy loam prevails is absolutely dependent on our being able to obtain a supply of potash; the production of those crops depends absolutely on that. I understand that that is also true in Virginia.

I do not think this body can do a better thing at this time than to agitate the question of an additional supply of potash, as we are now totally dependent upon the potash wells in Germany.

I also now take occasion to call attention to the other prime ingredient of fertilizers—nitrogen. We have an abundant supply of that in the air. The method of its extraction has gone beyond the experimental stage and is a commercial success. In the contemplation of our water-power bill I think we ought to make provision by which these ingredients, so essential to the development of our land and to the production of our crops, should be developed in such abundance as to meet the requirements of the agricultural interests of the country and at such prices as farmers can afford to pay and not leave them at the mercy of the combinations that control the fertilizer trade.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to call the attention of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the fact that a letter of January 27, 1916, from the Secretary of Agriculture transmitting a report as to the fertilizer situation in the United States has already been printed as a public document, being Senate Document No. 262. In that document the Senator will find a complete report from the Secretary of Agriculture as to the availability of potash and nitrates in the United States, telling where they are to be found, or, at least, where they are up to the present time known to be; also the amount consumed in the United States, and what likelihood there is for the production in the United States of sufficient potash to supply the demands of the country.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah, of course, knows that in that report the Secretary calls attention to the fact that the only available supply of nitrates is from atmospheric nitrogen. In a talk with the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture he informed me that there was an unlimited supply of kelp along the entire Pacific coast, which is valuable for agricultural purposes. It is mowed something after the manner of mowing grain, and there is practically very little cost involved. The main difficulty is in the drying and grinding. It is also true that the freight rate is low; but on account of lack of legislation, there is a failure to provide machinery for putting this product on the market. While we have an abundance of it, we are starving in its presence. I am glad that my colleague has called attention to this matter.

I want to say, in this connection, that I do not believe that the Agricultural Department, the Geological Survey, and those charged with responsibility in the matter have examined the contents of feldspar deposits to a sufficient degree to determine whether or not it is practical to use it commercially. The report, which they sent to me in reply to the newspaper clipping which I forwarded to them, which was identical with the clipping which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has had read at the desk, states that, while there are various deposits of feldspar, particular attention is called to the deposit in the State of Utah, where they say it is almost as available as the nitrates in Chile, but that the freight rates to South Atlantic ports are prohibitive.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the report covers the kelp beds along the coast of California and also covers a part of the known supply in the State of Utah.

I wish to allay the apprehension of Senators and the people of the country generally in regard to this matter. I do not believe there is any reason for serious apprehension as to the future supply of potash and nitrates in this country. I agree with all that is stated in the Secretary of Agriculture's report. I desire to say further that there is a plant at Marysvale, Utah, producing about 10,000 tons per annum of potash. The owners are at present at work with a view of doubling the capacity of that plant, but of course even with the increase the amount produced would be a very small percentage of what is consumed in the United States. There are consumed in the United States, in round numbers, 400,000 tons of potash.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator means potash salt.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to add, Mr. President, that there is under way a process for extracting the potash from the waters of Salt Lake, and if the laboratory tests that have already been made can be duplicated by a mill or process extracting the potash in large quantities—and I have no doubt it can be—there will be enough potash extracted from Salt Lake to supply the needs of the United States, on the basis of the amount now consumed, for over 300 years from that one source alone. I have seen the figures, Mr. President, showing what it will cost under the proposed process, and I believe the plan is feasible and is going to be a success. I may say also that there is one company at the present time utilizing the mother liquors from the salt water that is being evaporated by the sun to produce salt and extracting the potash from those liquors.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that I asked the Agricultural Department to submit to me a statement as to the cost of delivery at the South Atlantic ports. The estimated cost per ton of the potash extracted from alunite from Utah to Carolina ports was approximately $35. The German kainit, which generally comes in a form available for commercial fertilizer use—not the muriate of potash, which is a condensed salt, but what we term kainit, which is a form ready for commercial purposes——

Mr. TILLMAN. That is mostly common salt.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The basis is not really salt. That can be delivered at $6 or $7 per ton, while the product of the kelp on the Pacific coast, which is as good as kainit which we import from Germany, can be delivered for about $10.33 at the South Atlantic ports. So that we can not hope for relief, even from the potash beds in Utah, unless we can get a freight rate that will make it commercially possible to use it.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that the product, when taken from the salt water, is 80 per cent pure potash, and, of course, the rate upon that would not be more than $7 or $10; but even if it were more, of course, that is virtually the pure stuff and can be put in fertilizer.

So I have not any doubt, Mr. President, that it will be but a few years now until the cry for potash in this country will cease.

Mr. TILLMAN. And in the meantime thousands will starve to death, for they will not be able to make any cotton.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator on that point that an effort is being made to get the machinery in shape now to begin the extraction of potash from that water, and, as has been said, there is a small company working there now for that very purpose.

Mr. TILLMAN. We are getting away from Bulletin 104. Will the Committee on Printing have it printed?

Mr. SMOOT. The committee will pass on the question.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina, I believe, asked to have a bulletin printed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I desire to have printed a bulletin from the Agricultural Department, the copies of which have been exhausted and of which there are now practically no copies in existence.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to ask the Senator if that bulletin is practically the same thing as the letter from the Secretary of Agriculture transmitting the report as to the fertilizer situation in the United States?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is entirely different. The bulletin to which I refer is an old bulletin printed in 1907.

Mr. FLETCHER. The letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, I will say to the Senator, has been printed, and the Joint Committee on Printing has ordered additional copies of it printed. Whether it covers the same matter, I do not know.

Mr. TILLMAN. It does not cover the same matter. I want to have Bulletin 104 printed.

Mr. SMOOT. The matter is to be referred to the committee, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the motion is to refer the resolution to the committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. The resolution has been read for the information of the Senate, and I will ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not know whether the Senator from South Carolina had seen this letter.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; I have seen it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to say to him that the joint committee has ordered additional copies of that letter printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from South Carolina will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

THE SEAMEN'S ACT (S. DOC. NO. 333).

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 84, to print as a Senate document the manuscript entitled "The Seamen's Act of 1915," by Henry W. Farnam.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks he should call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that there is an order of the Senate that immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business the Senate shall hold exercises appropriate to the reception and acceptance from the State of Minnesota of a statue of Henry Mower Rice.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I was seeking an opportunity to get in before the conclusion of the morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 84) reported by Mr. FLETCHER from the Committee on Printing January 28, 1916, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. LA FOLLETTE) on January 19, 1916, entitled "The Seamen's Act of 1915," by Henry W. Farnam, professor of political economy at Yale University, be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say that the resolution has been favorably reported by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FLETCHER. It has been favorably reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ACCEPTANCE OF STATUE OF HENRY MOWER RICE.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk a concurrent resolution which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 13) was read and considered, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statue of Henry Mower Rice, presented by the State of Minnesota to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered to the State for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for the purity of his life and his distinguished services to the State and Nation.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, Congress has accorded to each State of the Union the privilege of placing in this Capitol, in Statuary Hall, statues of two of its eminent men, to be selected by the respective States. Minnesota has now for the first time availed herself of this privilege by placing in Statuary Hall a statue of Henry M. Rice, one of the first representatives of the State of Minnesota in this body.

Mr. Rice was born in the State of Vermont in the year 1817. He came to what is now the State of Minnesota, but was then an unexplored wilderness, a sort of "no man's land," in 1839, 10 years before Minnesota became an organized Territory. In 1853 he was elected a Delegate to Congress from that Territory. He was reelected in 1855; and in 1857 he and Gen. Shields were elected the first Senators from the State of Minnesota. Mr. Rice took his seat in the Senate of the United States in May, 1858, on the admission of the State into the Union.

Senator Rice had a most remarkable record. He was one of the great men who came to the embryo State who was instrumental in laying the foundations of our government and of our prosperity. When he first came to the State he was engaged as the representative of one of the great fur companies. At that time the country was an unexplored wilderness. There were very few people except some soldiers at Fort Snelling and a few missionaries, and in addition to that the fur traders and their employees. By reason of the fact that as a fur trader Mr. Rice became intimate with the Indians, he became very popular with them. They looked upon him with favor, because he always treated them fairly, and as a consequence he was largely instrumental in securing their consent to the opening of the country to white settlement. When he came to the State in 1839, the whole country, except a little territory around Fort Snelling, was occupied by nomadic bands of Sioux and Chippewa Indians.

The first great problem of the embryo State was to secure those lands from the Indians, and to obtain the removal of the Indians therefrom. In this matter Senator Rice was very active and efficient. He perhaps had more influence than anybody else with the Indians; and as a result of his efforts, in the forties and early fifties, the Sioux and Chippewa Indians ceded to the United States most of their lands in Minnesota, and that opened the country to settlement and enabled it to embark on the great progress it has since made.

Senator Rice, as a Delegate in Congress, had the strenuous work that falls to the lot of a Delegate from a Territory. He was very efficient and very industrious in securing suitable legislation for the young Territory. It is a remarkable fact that at the time Mr. Rice came to Minnesota a portion of the State was under the jurisdiction of the State of Iowa, and a portion of it under the jurisdiction of the State of Wisconsin. In 1848, when Wisconsin became a State, it left that part of Minnesota east of the Mississippi River without any government, a sort of no man's land; and the first important task Senator Rice had to perform was in aiding to secure legislation creating the Territory of Minnesota.

As a Delegate in Congress Mr. Rice was largely instrumental in preparing and securing the passage of the enabling act authorizing Minnesota to adopt a State constitution and to become a member of the Federal Union, and the State honored him by electing him one of its first Senators. He was elected at the same time as Gen. Shields, who had the unique distinction of having represented in this body three different States; but when they came here to the Senate of the United States Gen. Shields drew the short term and Mr. Rice drew the long term.

Mr. Rice was a Member of this body from 1858 until 1863. He served on some of the most important committees and was a most active and efficient Member of this body. He was a man of fine education, of great intellectual abilities, a man of sterling character, and a man who always aimed to serve the public efficiently and faithfully.

Minnesota was fortunate in having in its early days a number of young men who came from the East and started it on the path to statehood. Among these men—and it has been my lot to be acquainted with many of them—one of the most eminent was Senator Rice, and I feel that the State has made a wise selection in selecting him as its first representative here in Statuary Hall.

Mr. President, I have elsewhere on another occasion in a more extended manner paid my tribute to Senator Rice, and I will not take the time of the Senate further on this occasion. There are other Senators who were acquainted with the Senator who will dwell more on his great merits and his value both to the State of Minnesota and to our common country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the State of Minnesota was born in the space of a decade. Originally a part of the Territory of Wisconsin, it became a Territory almost immediately after the State of Wisconsin was admitted to the Union. It then had a population of scarcely 5,000 souls. Within 10 years it was admitted to statehood, with a population of nearly 300,000 people.

Three great men contributed primarily to the birth and building of the State. Henry H. Sibley, the first Delegate from the Territory to the Congress of the United States, the man who secured territorial recognition and afterwards the first governor of the State. Alexander Ramsey, the State's first territorial governor and subsequently one of its Representatives in the Congress of the United States; the man who primarily secured the secession of territory from the Indian tribes and opened the way to white civilization. A few days after Gov. Ramsey was appointed the territorial governor and came to St. Paul to reside, another citizen established himself in that city. His ambition was not primarily to gather the unearned increment in the rapidly growing metropolis of the future, for he almost immediately showed his desire to take part in civic affairs and serve well the people of his adopted State. Henry

M. Rice was born in Vermont in 1816, and at the age of 19 years emigrated to the State of Wisconsin. He came to Minnesota in 1839 equipped with an academy education, and he had studied law for two years. He was first employed by the Chouteaus, of St. Louis, who had acquired the business of the American Fur Co., and afterwards became a partner in this business and moved to Mendota, Minn., for a short time, but subsequently located permanently in St. Paul. Mr. Rice was a leader in every enterprise that looked to the development of the town. Whatever success he made he generously shared with the public. His personal qualities were such that they were immediately recognized. He was given public employment and secured great success in it. His manners were so gracious—and yet not patronizing—that he made friends with all sorts and conditions of men. He divined with unerring instinct the motives of men and parties and knew when and how by appropriate suggestion to let them apparently move themselves toward his desired ends. He was the personal representative of the Sioux Tribe of Winnebagoes, always held their confidence and successfully managed their affairs both for the Indians and the white settlers who were rapidly building homes in the State.

Mr. Rice was born a Democrat, of the old Jeffersonian school of democracy, and remained true to the faith even during the trying times of the war between the States.

He was first elected to office as Delegate from Minnesota in the Thirty-third Congress. He took his seat as Delegate in Congress in December, 1853. Industrious, persuasive, and soon influential, he promoted in many ways the interests of the Territory and his constituents, and by so doing obtained a popularity hardly equalled in the history of Minnesota. He was diligent in laboring for the extension of the surveys and the establishment of land offices. He secured the opening of post offices in the new villages. His influence contributed to the extension of the preemption system to unsurveyed lands, a change which virtually opened all lands not Indian to settlement. Mr. Rice's personal qualities were such as to give him wide acquaintance and influence, and these were extended in no small degree by those of the Virginia lady whom he had taken as his wife, née Miss Mathilda Whittall. Standing for reelection in the fall of 1855 he won by a handsome plurality over his Republican opponent and an Independent Democratic candidate.

Delegate Rice, desiring to secure statehood for his constituents early in the session of 1857, had introduced a bill to enable the people of Minnesota to organize a State and come into the Union. The bill was subject to long debate and serious contention in both Houses of the Congress, but before the end of the session it was enacted into law and approved by the President.

The enabling act as passed February 26, 1857, was in the form which had become traditional, and embodied grants of public lands for schools, a university, and public buildings.

Henry H. Sibley having been elected the first governor of the State and the Territorial legislature organized, it was necessary to elect two United States Senators. Henry M. Rice, as everybody expected, was nominated by his party caucus without opposition and subsequently elected. Gen. James W. Shields was a newcomer in Minnesota and little known; he had served with distinction in the Mexican War and filled many offices in his former State, Illinois, and served a term in the United States Senate from that State, was selected as his colleague.

Henry M. Rice served in every position to which he was called by his people with distinguished ability and an unfaltering desire to promote the welfare of his State and his country. His memory is cherished in the hearts of all who knew him, and his life will always be an example to the coming generations of young men in his State to inspire them to high ideals and a patriotic performance of all public duties.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, there is no particular occasion for me to add a word of tribute to the memory of him whom we are honoring to-day, save that in Ohio we feel a very close relationship to Minnesota, because the two States were a part of the Northwest Territory which was Virginia's magnificent gift to an expanding Nation. I recalled, while the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was speaking, that when the patriotism of the South and the patriotism of the North were in conflict to wipe out an ambiguity in the Constitution, the States builded out of the great Northwest Territory gave a million muskets and 50,000 swords toward the preservation of our nationality.

I like to say a word of tribute to the memory of Mr. Rice because of the stalwart type he so notably characterized. There are two classes of American builders, Mr. President, who ought to be immortalized. One class is composed of those stalwart and seemingly inspired fathers who laid the foundation of this Republic, seemingly the first dependable, representative, popular Government on the face of the earth. But no less important are the rugged pioneers who marched under the light of the westward star of empire and laid the foundations of the great western Commonwealths, which have done so much in contributing to the expansion and the enlargement and the glorification of the American Nation.

I sometimes think we have been remiss in paying a just estimate to the work of the pioneers. One of my age can have no intimate knowledge of the hardships they endured, of the personalities that they developed; but I can recall in my boyhood time a very interesting experience when the sons and the daughters of the men of Ohio were attracted by the lure of the still farther West, at a time when railway transportation had not opened up the great avenues of the West, when a class of our sturdy sons and daughters, bred by those stalwarts who had developed the Buckeye State—and I speak of it as only one of many contributing States—these sons and daughters, with barely more than sufficient means to furnish a wagon and a team with a very limited equipment, took all that they had of material possessions, and with courage in their hearts and resolution in their breasts made the overland trip westward for the development of Iowa and Kansas and Minnesota, all the time moving westward to contribute to the jewels in the crown of the expanded Nation. I know that in those days they succeeded because they were made of that stern stuff which had developed amid discouragement at home. They had failed in their undertakings for one reason or another, and they were resolved to start anew, just as the New England fathers did when they planted their first colony at Plymouth Rock. And out of that resolution and their hardship and their simple life, out of that determination to do for themselves, they laid the foundations of the developing West. Whoever they were, no matter from whence they started anew, these pioneers were the great builders. And I want to say that the man who laid the cornerstone of a great Commonwealth like the State of Minnesota is entitled to the enduring tribute of the American people.

One word more, Mr. President, on that. I should like to be able to say something, though in a less rambling way than I am obliged to-day, to preserve and magnify the type of that sterling American citizenship. It is good to recall that 200 years ago, or 400 years ago, or any period one may choose, there were in the State of Minnesota the same soil, the same waters, the same mineral wealth, the same opportunity for man's fortunate habitation that exist there to-day. But it required the human touch; it required the application and ministration of citizenship, and the developing efforts of those who went out and made battle with nature's wilderness, when heroes perished without fame's acclaim. It was those who went out and turned the wilderness into a garden spot and made the most and the greatest achievement possible to man. And they did it because of rugged individuality, conquering personality, and real citizenship. They did it because they lived simply and pushed forward in a determination to achieve. I tell you, Senators, if there is any one thing needed to go on in the fulfillment of our great American life it is the preservation of their sterling qualities of a citizenship enhanced by a simple life.

It strikes me that if there is any one great menacing tendency in modern times growing out of our material good fortune it is the tendency to a life which was never intended to be adopted if one aims at accomplishment. I like to recall the simplicity of the pioneers. They had the same motives, they had the same desires which have impelled mankind from the beginning of the world; but they were content in their own consciousness of accomplishment. They were intensely patriotic. They were appreciative of the opportunities that came from the founding fathers, and, like the man whose memory we are seeking to pay tribute to to-day, they were abidingly honest.

I like what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] said about the standing of Mr. Rice with the Indians. I take it that he not only dealt honestly in his personal relationships, but he kept his contracts; and I want to say in offering my tribute that the one great example we need in these United States is the man who is abidingly honest and keeps his contracts, whatever they may be.

Mr. President, I had not intended to speak even at this length. I am glad that Minnesota has placed its memorial of Mr. Rice in the Hall of Statuary, and I am glad that there is a line to go in the RECORD in making our acknowledgments to the State of Minnesota, because we ought to prize this example of sturdy, stalwart, honest, and patriotic American citizenship developed in the great work of adding a Commonwealth to the American Union.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has already stated, Henry M. Rice was a Delegate from the Territory of Minnesota in the Thirty-third and Thirty-fourth Congresses, and a Member of the Senate from May 11, 1858, to March 3, 1863. This was during an interesting period of our history, the years shortly preceding the Civil War. Mr. Rice left the Senate 28 years before I entered it, so that my knowledge of the man is a matter of history.

The Senators from Minnesota have asked me, as the present oldest Senator in years and in continuous service, to say a few words on this interesting occasion, and I have not found it in my heart to do otherwise than respond to the wish of my genial colleagues from that great State, inadequate as my words must of necessity be.

Mr. Rice was of New England ancestry, having been born in the State of Vermont, emigrating to Minnesota at an early age. While serving as a Delegate in Congress, the President of the United States was Franklin Pierce, a New Hampshire man. The Senate, at the time Mr. Rice entered it, contained in its membership many men of great ability as orators, legislators, and statesmen, some of whom figured largely in the stirring events which shortly followed. In that list are found the names of Clement C. Clay, jr., of Alabama, Robert W. Johnson of Arkansas, William M. Gwin and David C. Broderick of California, Lafayette S. Foster of Connecticut, James A. Bayard of Delaware, David A. Yulee of Florida, Robert Toombs of Georgia, Stephen A. Douglas and Lyman Trumbull of Illinois, Jesse D. Bright of Indiana, James Harlan of Iowa, John J. Crittenden of Kentucky, Judah P. Benjamin of Louisiana, William Pitt Fessenden and Hannibal Hamlin of Maine, Charles Sumner and Henry Wilson of Massachusetts, Zachariah Chandler of Michigan, Jefferson Davis of Mississippi, James Bell and John P. Hale of New Hampshire, William H. Seward and Preston King of New York, Benjamin F. Wade and George E. Pugh of Ohio, Joseph Lane of Oregon, Simon Cameron of Pennsylvania, Andrew P. Butler of South Carolina, John Bell and Andrew Johnson of Tennessee, Sam Houston of Texas, Solomon Foot and Jacob Collamer of Vermont, James M. Mason of Virginia, and James R. Doolittle of Wisconsin, a list of able men, never excelled in the history of our country.

In addition to the two distinguished men who represented New Hampshire in the Senate at that time, in the list are found the names of three other natives of my State—William Pitt Fessenden of Maine, Zachariah Chandler of Michigan, and Henry Wilson of Massachusetts, men who left a deep impress upon the legislation of the country.

Mr. Rice did not make many speeches while in the Senate, but the Congressional Globe shows that he frequently engaged in debate, and took a vital interest in all matters relating to the Indians, of whom there were many in Minnesota, the administration of the public land laws, postal affairs, and the building of the Pacific railroad. He contended that the Pacific railroad should start from a point on the boundary of Minnesota instead of from a point on the Missouri River.

On a certain occasion, after a heated debate between Senators Dixon and Fessenden, Senator Rice expressed himself as being much opposed to personal controversies of that kind, saying that the older Senators should not set a bad example to the younger ones. On another occasion, when an attempt was made to stop applause in the galleries, under the threat that if repeated the galleries would be cleared, Senator Rice expressed himself as follows:

> The people come for the purpose of listening to speeches that are made, and when the impulses of their hearts shall induce them to applaud, I will not condemn it. I hope they will be permitted to remain.

Senator Rice was opposed to the free distribution of seeds, showing that some of the very questions that are being warmly discussed in the Senate now were being discussed in his time.

On the whole, Senator Rice seems to have been very attentive to his senatorial duties and to have been on the right side of all questions that were of concern to the people whom he represented. He was a fit representative of those whom he served, and, judged by his legislative record, served them with ability and fidelity, thus fully earning the recognition that the people of Minnesota are to-day bestowing on him.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, when in my youth it was my privilege first to meet Mr. Rice he had already passed the meridian of life, and presented that attractive spectacle of one whose step was still strong, whose eyes were undimmed, whose faculties were unimpaired, and yet who showed the mellowing touch of time and in the retiring of age could enjoy the reflections which come after a life of achievement.

It has been said that our race is a weary traveler. It is certainly true that that portion of humanity from which we are sprung has made a wonderful pilgrimage, whether inspired by Divine commission or whether born of the instincts of those who compose that current of humanity none can say. That current of humanity possessed two remarkable traits, two remarkable characteristics. Coming in early days from somewhere in the then great unknown of eastern Europe, it moved along the northern coast, draining the morass and the swamp, leveling the forest, braving the Northern Sea, reaching those islands which even in Biblical times were known as the Isles of the North, ever moving, ever pressing westward, the vanguard crossing the trackless and uncharted Atlantic, it found its lodgment upon what was then the somewhat inhospitable coast of New England; but still it moved westward, and over mountains and through defiles, hewing its way through forests, it finally spread out upon the great inland plains of our continent.

Another remarkable trait of that branch of the human family is found in the fact that while it ever moved westward, it ever moved toward the goal of freer government, until it reached that goal in the founding of this Government. But the establishment of our Government, like the lodgment of this current of humanity upon the Atlantic coast, was not the end; it was but the beginning of a greater chapter. While our fathers, wise in their day and generation, founded a Government, the outcome of a patriotic wisdom never before witnessed in any assemblage in history, yet the written government is cold and lifeless, the words upon the page have no meaning, unless those words are woven into action, into spirit, and into purpose.

To-day there are upon the American Continent governments which copied our Constitution, and yet present the sad spectacle of despotism or, what may be worse, the tyranny of anarchy itself. It is in the spirit, in the purpose, of a people that the fabric of written legislation must be woven and developed into spirit, purpose, and living form. As that current of humanity moved westward and began to diffuse itself over the great inland plain, it took upon itself the task of molding government. In the genesis of this movement from that somewhat mysterious dawn in the shade of the history of northern Europe down to the time of our own day, each generation has well done its work. Those men who drained the swamps and the morasses of northern Europe, those who rescued the soil of Holland from the grasp of the sea, those who developed a civilization in England, those who brought a John to a recognition of the rights of man, those people who brought a Charles to the block, those who in turn founded this Government, those who endured the hardship of a revolution that we might be free, those who in later days preserved the Union thus founded, those who tracked the trackless forests of the West and converted the plains of the midland to the habitation of man, those who in the years gone have given form and color to the spirit of our institutions, each and all well performed their part in their day and generation.

The last great task of this movement after the establishment of government and as essential to the developments of the spirit of our institutions was the establishment of opportunity, and through the efforts to subjugate the material character of our land, through the establishment of free government, and through the establishment of equality of opportunity, there came the great characters which have adorned the pages of our history, because this made it possible in the character of the men themselves not only to surmount all other obstacles but also to overcome the limitations of humble origin and a boyhood of poverty. Part and parcel of this great movement was the man whose name we honor to-day.

Born in New England, leaving his New England home when even the humble surroundings of a New England home of a century ago spelled civilization compared with the wildness into which he was to penetrate, he went westward and joined for a while the efforts of those who were laying the foundations of what is now the great Commonwealth of Michigan. There he joined with those who, then in the first flush of their young manhood, were engaged in this American task of building government, fitting our country for civilization and development along great and lasting lines—men then unknown, but men who, by their energy, their sturdy characters and wisdom, not only laid deep and broad the foundations of that great Commonwealth, but brought fame to themselves in their achievements. But this lure of the West that had called this race, caused Mr. Rice to move farther westward, until he found himself in what is now the State of Minnesota.

I wish I had the descriptive power to portray the character of that class of men of which he was a fitting type. They were peculiar in themselves; their like is found nowhere else in our history. There was a culture and refinement about them; they could adorn the bench, the Senate Hall, or my lady's parlor. There was a certain dash about them; and yet there was that fortitude, that courage, that power of endurance that enabled them to withstand all the severe and untried conditions of the western country.

If you understand the nature of the Indian as he was when our forefathers landed on these shores, you will not wonder that between men of this type and the leaders of the Indians there sprang up a friendship amounting almost to affection, because, while there rolled between the leaders of the Indian tribes and these cultured, refined men that gulf that separates the educated and the cultured from the uneducated and the uncultured, there was a strong current of sympathy in nobility of character that drew them together in that knightly spirit that, after all, was the predominating feature of these great pioneers. And when Mr. Rice passed away, borrowing an expression which my colleague [Mr. NELSON] used in Statuary Hall on the occasion of the unveiling of the statue of this distinguished son of Minnesota, the Indians who had known him so well during all these years said that, while they believed he had gone to a brighter and a better land, yet, after all, they wished he might have remained with them.

No generation ever has measured, or ever will in its own time measure, accurately either the direction, the speed, or the force of the movement of which it is a part. It is only after the long sweep of the centuries that there can be viewed the connection between events sequential in their character. It is only then that there can be made a measurement of the great movements of humanity. So to-day, while we wonder at the great growth of our cities, the development of our land, the limitless wealth and resources of our Nation, we can not adequately measure the direction, the scope, or the force of the movement of which we are a part. It may, however, be interesting for me to say that I have in my possession a small book, a very small book, which contains the record of the enactments of the First Territorial Council of Minnesota; and, as small as that book is, an appendix to that little book contains the census, giving by name every inhabitant of the then Territory of Minnesota. To-day some two and a half million people constitute the humanity of that great Commonwealth, and that within the lifetime of those now living. Into that wonderful work of material and institutional development Mr. Rice threw himself with all his zeal and ardor, and he helped to develop that Commonwealth, and that Commonwealth in turn has honored him.

It so happens that each State can only place two statues of its distinguished citizens in Statuary Hall; yet of the people of the Western States there are unnumbered thousands who well deserve the recognition we have accorded Mr. Rice. As I have said however, it is impossible to accord this particular distinction to more than two, and I feel to-day that if Mr. Rice could, in a continuation of his personal identity, look down upon these services, appreciating, as he would, the great honor that is being conferred on him, yet out of the generous impulses of his nature he would wish that the statues of those who had shared in that great work of the past might also adorn Statuary Hall.

It is wise that we accord this honor; it is wise that we keep alive the memory of those who have gone before. Man is so constituted that he must ever have a symbol, something as the outward form to express the thought that is within him. We can not have a country without a flag; we can not have religion without a church. Man must ever have a symbol and a shrine, and it is well that we take as our symbol the names of the leaders of the past; it is well that we worship at the shrine of their achievements. Their names as symbols, their achievements as a shrine, may serve to keep within our midst that strong and vigorous character and nature which every one recognizes the higher and more complex civilization must more and more weaken if not destroy.

Mr. President, I have spoken more of the genesis of the movement of which Mr. Rice was a part and a type than I have of Mr. Rice himself, because, after all, it is his contribution to the genesis of this movement, it is this environment and this condition which combined to make the achievements of Mr. Rice worthy of the commemoration which the great State of Minnesota has bestowed upon them.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the resolution offered by my colleague.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the resolutions are unanimously adopted.

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 48, House bill 562.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, while I feel that Order of Business No. 18 is entitled to precedence, the time is so short until 2 o'clock that, without in any way waiving the start that we have made on No. 18, I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 562) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a Postal Savings System, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to state that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] is absent on official business.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the Senate has given unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I called up—the Post Office bill. Owing to the fact that there are only 10 minutes left between now and the time when the unfinished business comes on, I will not ask the Senate to enter upon the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the distinguished Senator from Alabama that when this bill is up again I hope he will be prepared to make a clear statement of the changes in the law and exactly what the exhaustive amendments which the committee has inserted mean. This is a matter that we have discussed heretofore, and it seems to me that the changes are very radical, but I have not had time to examine it except casually at my desk.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is only one change in the bill that I think will provoke any controversy whatever, and that is the amendment to the postal-savings law. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the committee has filed a very elaborate report on this bill. It is Order of Business No. 48. I will have the clerk of the committee deliver to the Senator from New Hampshire a copy of the report in order that he may examine it and note the reasons for the changes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall be very glad to examine the report. My attention had not been called to this bill until the Senator asked to have it considered, and I shall certainly give very careful consideration to the report. I am glad the report has been made by the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator will find a very elaborate explanation of the changes in the postal-savings law, and whatever changes have been made in other sections of the postal law, full set out in this report, and the reasons given for the changes.

Mr. LEWIS obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to address myself to a matter which I feel justifies the attention of Senators on this side of the Chamber, and it is not without its interest to those on the opposite side of the Chamber. I am gratified that the quorum call was made, as there may be Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar under Rule VIII is the regular order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I call for the regular order.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 1053) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SPEECH OF SENATOR LEWIS.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I came into the Senate this morning after an absence of a few days, and this absence accounts for my delay in referring to a matter which otherwise I would have taken up in this body some days earlier. I refer to the speech of ex-Senator Root, as chairman of the Republican State convention of New York. An editorial from an important paper in my city attracted my attention. It addresses its comments toward the Democracy and bases its criticism of the President on the speech made by ex-Senator Root, of the State of New York, while presiding as the chairman of a Republican State convention of New York, the occasion being the selection of delegates to the national convention. This paper—as others of the Nation—calls the attention of the country to the accusations of ex-Senator Root, and intimates that because of the very high source from whence they come they are indisputable and stand as an unanswerable indictment of the Wilson administration, for which I now assume to speak.

At this time I desire to take a few minutes of the time of the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and address myself, not to the theme of the pending bill but to the theme of the hypocrisy of statesmanship.

I know that the great Edmund Burke had occasion once to tender an excuse for otherwise unpardonable errors on the part of eminent men doing unexpected things against the English Government by saying: "We can pardon much to the errors of liberty." But I am not able, adjusting myself to conscience, to say that we should pardon the liberty of deliberate error on the part of wisdom—particularly when it assumes to be statesmanship which is to advise the country and direct the Nation.

The eminent ex-Senator from New York, Hon. Elihu Root, assuming the privilege as chairman of the Republican State convention to speak the keynote of the Republican Party as he then represented it, found it agreeable to assail the President of the United States and present him before the country as a pretender in his policies and a weak and impotent officer in the execution of his undertakings. The ex-Senator would have the country understand that the President of the United States was unworthy of the further confidence of the country, and that the Democratic Party was no longer entitled to the respect that wisdom and patriotism would confer upon it. He tendered as the two counts of his indictment the charge that the administration had failed in its duty to the country; first, by declining to go into war with Mexico, and, second, in declining to provoke war with Germany.

My purpose, Mr. President, is to attract the attention of the country to those inconsistencies which are permitted on the part of those to whom greatness is vouched, either out of generosity of admiration or the falsity of worship which attends men who by accident or favor achieve influence beyond deserts of merit—where under other circumstances the same conduct on the part of any other person in lesser spheres would have been arraigned as an exhibition of ignorance on the one hand or malevolence on the other.

The Senator from New York, as chairman of the Republican State convention, speaking for his party, proceeds to arraign the Democracy on the ground, first, that it has failed to protect the lives of Americans in Mexico by failing to declare war against the Mexican country. He charges that the conduct of the administration has been so supine as to be worthy only of condemnation and so lacking in courage and wanting in statesmanship as to call for immediate ousting by the American public.

Mr. President, I want to ask what was the purpose of the able ex-Senator in preparing with deliberation this written indictment of the Democracy?—for it appears that his speech was prepared in writing, some features of it being omitted in its deliverance. Clearly the purpose was to provide for his party a platform upon which the issue was to be made in the coming election. It was to propose the policy upon which the campaign that is now approaching should be conducted. It had for its purpose the awakening of the American people to a spirit of resentment against the Democratic administration. Its deliberate object was to hold up the President of the United States as an individual unfit for the respect of his countrymen and unworthy the confidence of his Nation.

The Senator proceeds, as the basis for this issue for his political campaign, to make Mexico and Germany the particular subjects. Before I enter upon the latter two, I wish to invite the attention of the country to the fact that the conditions in Mexico, as they have existed now, say, in the last year—barring one additional atrocity—are the same that have been continuing for years. They are the same conditions as those existing a year and a half ago, and could have been made the basis of a campaign issue then as now, if to the mind of the distinguished statesman there was the idea or the hope that it was of the most avail. But we recall that the distinguished ex-Senator, in his speech at the Union League Club, of Philadelphia, in the month of March last year, laid down the issue for the Republican Party. He on that occasion there struck the "keynote," and that part of the press ever favoring any utterance of the distinguished Senator gave it eminence and prominence as the oracular decree of the political prophet. What was it? I reply that it will be recalled that then times were depressed in America. The war of the world had occasioned much uncertainty in the United States. Financial investors were timid, business was uncertain, and throughout the marts of trade there was stagnation, all because there was uncertainty as to how far the war would reach and whether the United States might become involved. But the conditions were sufficient to justify the able ex-Senator to there charge the responsibility to be upon the Democracy and to charge the Democratic administration with being responsible for those depressed financial conditions of America. So it was that the Senator said the issue should be "getting business away from this regulation by law," freeing "business from the trammels of too much legislation."

The able ex-Senator then said, as he struck his then "keynote," that the thing to do was to put this administration out of power and put in its stead a "business administration," and the Senator defined his purpose as well as his view by giving an illustration that what was needed in the country—as "another administration headed by another Mark Hanna."

Such then was the only issue, and such then, to the able Senator, was the need of the country. The Mexican situation was then, when he spoke, as it had been under the Taft administration and as it now is under Wilson.

What was the occasion of the change from these issues? It is this, Mr. President: Business has become aroused to the real object of the Democracy. It has become awakened to its true purpose as to commerce, and conscious that its object is to protect business, not to destroy it; to stimulate it, not to paralyze it; and that in Democracy business had found its friend. Then, with this new confidence possessing our countrymen, no longer torn asunder by dissensions between conflicting political factions in power, as previously existed in the Republican Party, when political officers of one faction immediately assailed the business of the other as a matter of revenge. Now it is clear to business that the policy of Democracy was to give fair treatment to all business of the country and to all institutions to be just from this new status everybody took a new life, business began bounding, and commerce leaped from the leash of the monopolist and rushed into the race of riches for all mankind.

Mr. President, the hour when panic could be the cry or the keynote had gone. The time when calamity could be charged against the Democratic tariff bill had passed. The occasion when hard times and depression, the misfortunes of the country, the poverty of mankind could all be charged to the Democracy had ended. Business was prosperous. Commerce multiplied. Everything gave evidence of wealth. The issue upon which so much had been deposited had forsaken the eminent leaders of our Republican opponents. Then the distinguished leader, Senator Root, chose to strike a new keynote for those who are anxious to have assurance on the part of those who are supposed to be in themselves able to give security to any property and assurance of exemption from regulation of wrongful conduct. Thus when the distinguished gentleman had failed to fix an issue on the former charges, we now find that the eminent ex-Senator says that the failure of Democracy in not going into Mexico, precipitating war, is an evidence on its part of its frailty in government and cowardice in action. That for such omission it is incompetent to longer hold the respect of the Nation of America or to continue in the confidence of its people. That this shall now be the issue—or one of the issues.

Yet, Mr. President, these same conditions to which he alludes prevailed under the administration under which he was spokesman when he held a seat on the floor of the Senate in the term of President Taft. This same situation, the same evils, the same disturbance, the same slaughters, the same murders in Mexico, regrettable as they were—they were not within our jurisdiction then, as they are not now—existed when an attempt was made on the part of the Democracy to remedy these things by the force of law, to be expressed in the Senate, yet what was the position of the eminent ex-Senator then, when, if he was sincere in his demand for war in Mexico, his voice could have spoken to give his now announced purposes execution?

The history of legislative action on Mexico discloses that in 1911, April 20, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is now the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, entered a resolution in which he sought power of the Senate to direct the President of the United States, then President Taft, to consider the atrocities which were then being perpetrated in Mexico, and to stop the offenses which were then being committed by conferring upon the Committee on Foreign Relations such power that they might have the authority to investigate and Congress intercede.

The resolution intimated that the result might lead to the entrance by the United States into Mexico to establish order by force. Mr. President, I observe the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], the successor of Senator Root, is rising. I beg he may do me the kindness to remain, that if any observation is to be made in opposition to my views he may feel free to indulge them. Indeed, I called for a quorum that any Senator who desires to reply to my observations—defend the utterances of the former Senator from New York—may do so.

Then, Mr. President, when the position was tendered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] exactly akin to that which ex-Senator Root now says should be that of the Democracy, what did the able Senator from New York do? Did he give support to the very position which he now says should have been taken by President Wilson? Did he give support to the tendered resolution? No; the Senator then rose in the Senate and condemned the effort of the Democracy to do the very thing which he says should have been done, and for want of which he says the Democracy has forfeited the respect of the citizens of this country. The able Senator from New York, April 20, 1911, referring to the resolution tendered by the Senator from Missouri asking for the very power to correct these wrongs and remedy these abuses in Mexico,—Senator Root, of New York, said—and I read from page 452, volume 47, part 1, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> Mr. President, before the subject is passed over and the resolution laid upon the table, I wish to express my entire dissent from the assumption which seemed to me to be carried by the expression of opinion on the part of the Senator from Missouri. Granting that injuries have been done to American citizens which ought to be redressed, that wounds have been inflicted, that lives have been taken, that property has been destroyed, it does not follow, sir, that we should begin the process of securing redress for those injuries by a threat of force on the part of a great and powerful nation against a smaller and weaker nation. That, sir, is to reverse the policy of the United States and to take a step backward in the pathway of civilization.
> There is no reason whatever, sir, to assume, if injuries have been done of the kind described, that the Government of Mexico is unwilling to make due redress upon having those injuries and claims for redress presented to her in the ordinary course of peaceful negotiation; and the passage of such a resolution as has been described, equivalent to a declaration of war, would be to preface the ordinary demand—the demand which it is the duty of every civilized power to make upon a friendly nation—with a threat that if the demand is not complied with force will be used.
> Sympathy with the people of Mexico in their distress, a just sense of the duties that we owe to that friendly people, and the duties that we owe to the peace of the world must forbid our assenting to or yielding to any such course—

Meaning the course provided for by the Stone resolution.

Mr. President, if it is just now when the able Senator from New York arraigns the Democracy, to demand that the Democracy shall go into Mexico with the power of this great Nation to enforce war, why was it not equally just under similar circumstances when the Senator from New York opposed it? If it was just then to oppose it upon the ground that it would be a violation of the traditions of America, a "step backward" in our course of humanity, it is equally true now as it was at the time the Senator from New York arraigned the Democracy before the country for not doing the very thing which he as one of the representatives of the Republican Party, sustaining President Taft, aided in preventing.

Therefore, Mr. President, we are at once called upon to ask ourselves what is the meaning of this form of hypocrisy of statesmanship that can indent itself upon the popular mind as being serious in purpose and responsible in utterance? What purpose is there behind that declaration except on the assumption that the public either forgets the past or is ignorant of the present? That the people can be deluded and deceived? The author of these utterances assumes that these issues can be created because of the eminent source that sponsors them. It is enough to the minds of some that a charge shall come from one occupying a high place as being sufficient to influence the public mind. By such alone may the injustice and injury to the opposing political party be accomplished, and all to create a political issue. This to provide a campaign cry—for election uses.

Then the distinguished Senator, among other arraignments, intimates, unless I misread his speech, that in recognizing Carranza in the course we have taken we have committed some unpardonable folly, intimating that the time and opportunity we did have to vindicate the honor of the United States was to have punished Huerta and Carranza.

Sir, the able Senator and the leader of his party striking this keynote of discord, of injustice surely could not forget that the American people are still able to turn to their record and recall that here in April, 1914, on the floor of this body when a resolution was tendered here to give to Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, power to move the Navy into Vera Cruz for the purpose of resenting an insult to the flag and vindicating the honor of America as against Huerta, the distinguished Senator from New York rose in his place here at night and inveighed against the injustice of the motion and the unrighteousness of the purpose. He was not content that we should give out to the world that such insult was cause for the United States to take any action whatever in Mexico. He protested against our proposed course because such may mean war with Mexico. Said the able Senator at that time, speaking almost in behalf of Huerta—I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 6985, April 21, 1914:

> The course which is proposed is the forcible armed compulsion of the people or some of the people of a friendly nation, the armed compulsion of a government which I think we all are agreed is an existing de facto government, having in its control the greater part of the territory of Mexico—the armed compulsion of that government to make amends to the United States for an insult to its flag.
> What is the justification?

And the Senator continues:

> We can not justify, sir, upon confidence which we all have in the President. We must justify upon grounds which commend themselves to our consciences, to our intelligence, to the conscience of the American people, and to the deliberate judgment of the civilized world.

Then proceeding the Senator said, characterizing the resolution brought forth from the Democracy demanding action:

> It is intervention, technically, but it is war in its essence that we are to vote to justify to-night. How long it will continue, what its results and its incidents will be, no man can state. Men will die, men dear to us will die, because of the action that we are to approve to-night. American homes will be desolate; American women will mourn; American children will go through life fatherless, because of the action that we are to approve to-night; and when those children, grown to manhood, turn back the page to learn in which cause their fathers died, are they to find that it was about a quarrel as to the number of guns and the form and ceremony of a salute and nothing else?

Indeed, the ex-Senator from New York, for party issue, is willing now to tell America that this Nation has failed in its duty that it did not plunge into war with Mexico. Such is urged as a party issue now, when the cry of business panic had failed to avail; and when in vain a protest against the Government regulating wrong had failed to find a following of sufficient quality and quantity to insure support from the Republican leaders of the East. I ask where is the difference of now and that time—April, 1914—when the distinguished Senator from New York beheld war in all its desolating aspects. That it meant men killed and children ahungered, left fatherless and homeless. That it meant our "dear ones to die." If this prospect then appalled him in its consideration and shocked him at the threshold of the undertaking, is that not the same future that is now threatened by the course he now demands? Why the change in the spirit of his human heart? Why the perversion of this generous nature merely to serve the purpose of an indictment against his own President of the United States? The answer is, it is for party purposes and political issues.

I have respect for eminence. I pay my tribute to ability. But from my humble position I indict the hypocrisy of statesmanship and refuse to allow my countrymen to be imposed upon by pretense which carries the glamor of reputation conferred by favor, to delude my countrymen either as having justice in its purpose or truth in its accusation.

Sir, therefore we see that we need seek no further answer as to Mexico for justification for the course of Democracy than that the able ex-Senator himself afforded in his opposition to Democracy when it sought to remedy this condition under the leadership of our distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He, the Senator from New York, opposed the action of the Democratic President of the United States to accomplish that, for the failure of which he now indicts him in public speech.

I indict the hypocrisy of statesmanship. I challenge admiration for truth, and to sincerity I pay my salute, however severe its accusation against me or my party; but where it assumes to mask in a false pretense to accomplish an object which it has previously indicted as unjust—yet nevertheless would execute for the mere purpose of party issue—I condemn it, sir. I deny such the respect of statesmanship, and state here in this place that such utterances as made by the ex-Senator, as chairman of the Republican State convention, under different circumstances and from lesser men would have been characterized as demagogy!!

Now, sir, we have seen that in Mexico these unfortunate atrocities, which I join my colleagues on the other side in condemning, have been remedied so far as such things can be under such unfortunate conditions as curse Mexico. The perpetrators of the murders and the assaults have met their death. They met it summarily under the order of the Carranza government. For the lives they have taken they have given up theirs. And yet the Senator with the knowledge that everything which could have been done by the President of the United States had already been done by the very agency the distinguished Senator himself had appealed to—the government in Mexico—there is not one word from the mouth of this distinguished leader in striking his keynote, telling the Nation that all these things for which he says my Government and our administration should enter into Mexico to declare war to remedy, to have been remedied, in so far as any administration in power in any land could have avenged, have been done. Not one word from the Senator that condign and complete punishment was meted out to the perpetrators. That they are dead.

Therefore, sir, as to Mexico I take the liberty to say the record discloses that the eminent Senator was striking a keynote without regard to justice or facts. I charge that he was deliberately unjust to the President of the United States, and purposely misrepresenting the Democracy of the Nation.

Now, Mr. President, as to Germany. The able Senator says in his keynote, striking a bass note (after having left the minor key of Mexico)—more base, I regret to charge, than bass—the Senator asserts that it is necessary we should have a President of the United States who has "something more than words." Who would "follow words by action." Yet I ask what action? What action does the eminent Senator, a leader of the Republican Party, mean? There can be but one other kind of action, and that is war. If the Senator would mean war, why did he not say war? Why mask under utterances ubiquitous and doubtful in construction, that anyone could gather whatever they would? The unlearned and humble, who suffer most by war, to feel that it means some action other than war. On the part of those who desire war to suggest action that is only war. If the able Senator, speaking for his party, expected to pledge his party to war with Germany as an issue in this country, let the party declare it with courage, and the Democracy will meet the issue." If the "action" referred to by the Senator means that the grievance against the Democracy is that it has not driven its people across the seas into Germany to be killed, "our dear ones to die," as the Senator said when opposing action in Mexico—leaving "our children to be ahungered, to be bereft of parents"—if that be not the purpose of the word "action" as used by him, what other action, then, could he refer to, speaking in behalf of his party? What action is it he will pledge his party to?

Why not tell the Government of America now, if the object is to make the issue against the Democratic President of the United States that he did not declare war, and say so? This hypocrisy of statesmanship I protest against, I protest against it as an American who will be called upon to tender all I have in the fateful hour of conflict. I desire to know the purpose on the part of the distinguished leader. I want him to say what he meant. If the object is to try to elect a Republican President under the covert object of war, yet to hide the purpose from the American people under doubtful phraseology, I here expose the fraud.

If, on the other hand, the purpose is that war shall be declared against Germany, and that the issue shall be war without regard to its merits or to the justification of the declaration, then let them come forth and declare the purpose, and the country shall judge them by their utterances, by their action, and by their sponsors. War with Germany? For what? Unhappily, sir, sad events in the past have transpired on the seas—lives lost and American rights denied. Unhappily the Lusitania incident, of course, is in the memory of us all, and the Gulflight and Cushing. But this administration, with the cooperation of many of my eminent Republican friends, looking toward peace and concord with all peoples, have turned their attention to a settlement of all differences by peaceful negotiation. Mr. President, we have moved to achieve results through the only course civilized countries ought to adopt as long as it is available—by methods of peace, by speech of religion. And what is now the result? We have found that before the world we can reach a solution without war. We have reached a settlement without injury. We have not disrupted the peace binding us between countries heretofore friendly and whose people have contributed so much to the splendid results and achievement of America; nor, sir, have we, the democracy, ever desired to break it. To the contrary, sir, we struggle to forever continue it.

Yet, says the ex-Senator, we want a President who will have other action. He indicts the President of the United States as a weak and supine victim of surroundings, whose tendency is to "address a note." Yet the able Senator, knowing the limitations of this constitutional Government of America, failed to tell the country that such is all any President of the United States can do. What else can he do? He may go to the country and speak from his lips. The only other thing permitted by our Constitution—to prevent Presidents who may become despots violating their authority and abusing power—is that they shall address by note their views either to the foreign government which is the object of action or to the representatives of our own Government for action. It is through Congress and from it alone may come action. Then if "action," that is, declaration or action of war, was a thing that the eminent Senator from New York would have the country understand was necessary as a fulfillment of the honor of America, I reply that since the Lusitania incident and the Gulflight incident the able Senator was a Member of this body. He was representing the imperial State of New York. There was no power in the world to paralyze his arm from introducing a resolution for "action" here in the Congress of the United States, the only place in all America where the power could be executed, and it was here where he served in his sovereign capacity. If there was such wrong upon this country that could only be righted in honor only by war between us and a friendly people; the death of our men, the paralysis of commerce, the end of all prosperity and progress in America—the devastation of America—then the eminent Senator was equally qualified to present such a resolution, for by law he had the authority. The President of the United States had no such authority within the Constitution. The President could not tender such resolution in Congress; Congress being the only source in America that could have taken the action which the distinguished Senator would have the country understand was necessary to the maintenance of the honor of this land. Yet for failure of the President to do that which he had no power to do, the President of this United States is, by the Senator, held up to the country as guilty of cowardice of conduct and displaying supineness of character fit only for the contempt of the brave and the condemnation of all political parties in America.

The eminent Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], the leader of the majority, suggests, as I speak, that if such views as were expressed by the distinguished ex-Senator from New York are the views of his party, that there is not a Senator on the other side but has the same privilege now, as he has had before, to tender a resolution for such action. Mr. President, I say that since there has been no such tender, since the ex-Senator from New York himself never tendered such, why, I ask, will he be found in a high place, in an elevated position, discharging an eminent trust, so abusing its common sense by attempting to delude the American people by arraigning the President of the United States, merely because he is a Democrat, as unworthy of their confidence for not doing that which he knows well within presidential power he could not do, and where no circumstances have ever justified such.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if my memory serves me correctly, the then Senator from New York, shortly after the outbreak of the European war, in a speech made in this city, but not in this Chamber, indorsing the attitude of the President, displayed great emotion, the tears coursing down his cheeks, as reported in the papers, when he announced his adhesion to the position which the President then occupied. I do not recall exactly when that is said to have occurred, but I thought it would not, perhaps, be out of place to call the Senator's attention to it at this time, since at that time the position of the Senator from New York was emotionally an indorsement of the President of the United States and his then professed policy.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. President, therefore I think we see clearly that, as to Germany, the eminent ex-Senator before the country puts his Nation in a position where she is misjudged, and his President where he is wrongly condemned, and himself now, with the truth of his own record correctly understood, as seeking issue—political issue, only politics—in any other place to be characterized as unworthy politics.

I now have a word to my eminent friend the ex-Senator from New York, Mr. Root. Mr. President, I wish it understood that I have a very high personal regard for ex-Senator Root. I applied to him for a clerkship in his law office when I first left college, and he showed his excellent wisdom in declining my request in those days when I sought the work [laughter]; and while in that respect it may have my approval, in view of one thing with another of which I am mostly conscious concerning myself, yet in this particular matter I speak seriously to say that while I respect him and have a very high regard for his eminent abilities, no man bemoans more than do I that such eminent capacities could be distorted to such ignoble uses.

Now, therefore, I ask, What action; action! what action? War? Yes. Who, sir, is it behind the Republican masters now that the party expects to serve by merely making war on Germany because it is Germany? Has a new campaign fund begun to glow in radiance invitingly before their faces? Has the cry that business is being assailed, that the tariff, the author of all our misfortunes, should be revised, and the demands for another Mark Hanna administration lost their potency? Why are these all abandoned and some new source appealed to? Who are these whom my Republican friends, these eminent leaders, are covertly cultivating now and from whom they expect much, if only they can make the issue of the next campaign a war against Germany without regard to its effect on America?

Now, Mr. President, when they have succeeded in this heartless and unnecessary design, and the issue is made before the country that the next mandate of the Republican Party is to be war, then let us ask you, Republican Senators, how shall you call the country into war—into "action," when before the world you are already indicting your country as being unable to conduct a war with any nation in the world, however weak or impotent? They confess that with 16 years of power, with the expenditure of $2,000,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS. And the expenditure of $2,500,000,000 during the last 15 years.

Mr. LEWIS. Singly and solely for but one arm of the defense, and as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] interpolates, $2,500,000,000 in the last 15 years—asserting that all of this had been expended under the guise and pretense of national defense—they confess before the world that the Democracy now comes into power to find no Army, no Navy—no method of defense whatever existing in this Nation.

Mr. KERN. And with only ammunition sufficient for a day and a half.

Mr. LEWIS. And for want of ammunition, as set forth by the experts' testimony before the committees, leaving us hopeless and defenseless. This is the condition that the then eminent Republican leaders have left this Republic. This is the naked estate which the Democracy was compelled to take over. Is it possible that so eminent a statesman as the distinguished ex-Senator from New York can, before his God in heaven and his fellow mankind on earth, invite his country to war, when she has not that wherewith to defend herself for 24 hours? If the accusations made by these Republican leaders against the country are true, will they send a defenseless people to their sure death, the Nation to certain defeat, the American people to dishonor? How will the Nation get their soldiers to Europe, if they have soldiers to send? Where are the ships upon which to convey the soldiers of America if there were to be war with Europe? Did not the eminent ex-Senator himself participate on this floor in the great and renowned filibuster having for its object the defeating of the Democracy of the only method which could have obtained the ships that could have conveyed the soldiers which might have maintained the honor of this Republic in the "action" or war which he tells our Nation is essential to its welfare and to the honor of the President? What means this spectacle of absurdities presented by the national keynote of the Republican master? It means the unscrupulous descent to contemptible things—all for politics.

Mr. President, I arose to call attention to the situation; and now, sir, I ask my country to view it. We are reaching results with Germany. Here and there differences arise, of course, as they do in all pending negotiations; but we have still maintained peace. There is no war in our land; our cities are not sacked; our fields are not withered; the dead are not heaped up in our streets; mothers are not shrieking as they see their babes bayoneted. Our land is at peace; women can still bless God that their homes are secure, their children happy; civilization can still turn to America and appeal to it as the only spot in all the world where "peace on earth" prevails under law and under the guidance of God, sustained by the patriotism of man.

We will continue this course; we will hold dear to our ancient tradition of peace with all nations; and despite the false statesmanship of eminent men who misrepresent their country merely to create falsely a party issue before their country, America will go on her course of peace with the world, justice to man, and honor to ourselves. Now, sir, as I leave this subject I would invoke the distinguished ex-Senator, Mr. Root, in his hereafter representative utterances, to adopt to his own obedience that creed which Wolsey gave to Cromwell: "Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's, THY God's, and TRUTH'S."

I thank the Senate.

REMARKS BY SENATOR SMOOT.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I feel quite sure that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has no desire to place ex-Senator Root in a false light in referring to the position of the Senator as taken in his speech delivered in the Senate on April 21, 1914. As I remember the speech, he has so placed him. The only purpose for which I rise——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senator. I was diverted, and did not know he was addressing me.

Mr. SMOOT. I say, the only purpose for which I rise is to read into the RECORD at this time, following the excerpts from ex-Senator Root's speech as quoted by the Senator from Illinois, and at this point all that ex-Senator Root said.

Mr. President, before doing this I wish first to call the attention of the Senate to the resolution to which ex-Senator Root was speaking. The resolution is as follows:

In view of the facts presented by the President of the United States in his address delivered to the Congress in joint session on the 20th day of April, 1914, with regard to certain affronts and indignities committed against the United States in Mexico: Be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is justified in the employment of the armed forces of the United States to enforce his demand for unequivocal amends for certain affronts and indignities committed against the United States; be it further

Resolved, That the United States disclaims any hostility to the Mexican people or any purpose to make war upon Mexico.

That was the resolution, Mr. President, to which the then Senator from New York was speaking; and I want to merely add this, that ex-Senator Root did not feel that the country would be justified in declaring war upon Mexico for the reasons as stated in the resolution that was reported to the Senate from the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senate will remember that the resolution, as sent to the House by the President and passed by the House, referred to Gen. Huerta in specific terms. The power and authority it was sought to confer upon the President by the House resolution were to be directed against Gen. Huerta; but the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate substituted and reported the resolution which I have just read. This is what ex-Senator Root said upon that occasion:

Mr. President, I shall not prolong very much this discussion, for I think that whatever action we take ought to be taken to-day without further delay. I do wish, however, to state the reasons for supporting the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in lieu of the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The President has asked Congress for its approval of a course which he purposed to follow to compel amends for an insult to the flag of the United States. A resolution has come from the House declaring that the President is justified in the course he proposes and naming Gen. Huerta as the person against whom the present action is understood to be directed. The Committee on Foreign Relations has reported a substitute resolution which omits all reference by name to Gen. Huerta, but so refers to the statements made by the President in his address that in explaining the justification of the course which he proposes the effect is substantially the same. We are not asked to authorize action; we are asked to justify it.

Mr. President, I have the highest respect—more than respect, I have regard and admiration—for the President of the United States. I have entire confidence in the sincerity of his purpose, in the lofty quality of the ideals which he pursues, and in the genuineness of his adherence to peace.

But we are asked not to express our opinion of the President of the United States, not to express our confidence in him or in his purposes. We are asked in the exercise of our duty as a part of the Government of the United States to declare a specified course of conduct under specified conditions to be justified It is our duty that we are to perform, our duty as a part of the Government of the United States, our duty to the hundred millions of people of the United States, to the community of nations, to the credit and good name of our country, to the honor and glory that this great democracy has intrusted to our hands as its representatives. This duty we are called upon to perform.

The course which is proposed is the forcible armed compulsion of the people or some of the people of a friendly nation, the armed compulsion of a government which I think we all are agreed is an existing de facto government, having in its control the greater part of the territory of Mexico—the armed compulsion of that government to make amends to the United States for an insult to its flag.

What is the justification? We can not justify, sir, upon confidence which we all have in the President. We must justify upon grounds which commend themselves to our consciences, to our intelligence, to the conscience of the American people, and to the deliberate judgment of the civilized world.

What is the justification? Observe, sir, I do not say that there is no justification. I ask what it is. In the address of the President, in the plain implications and exclusive inferences of the resolution which came from the House, and equally in the resolution reported by the committee, the justification is to be found in a single incident. That incident was this: A boatload of sailors in the uniform of the United States, upon a boat flying the flag of the United States, landed the other day at a wharf in Tampico and were arrested by an officer in charge of a guard, taken through the streets, presently returned to the boat and set free—a very gross offense to the dignity of the United States, an insult which can not be ignored.

But, sir, immediate amends were made. The action of the officer who made the arrest was disavowed by the government under which he served, the de facto government of Mexico, under the de facto presidency of Gen. Huerta. It is stated that the officer was in turn arrested and was to be punished. The commandant at Tampico apologized for the act and, promptly upon being advised of the circumstance, the head of the de facto government, Gen. Huerta, also apologized. Those amends, which would be all that could be expected from private individuals, were, nevertheless, not satisfactory and not sufficient for the officer in command of the American fleet or squadron at Tampico, and he demanded a formal salute to the American flag.

Mr. President, I agree with the admiral that the amends were not sufficient as coming from the de facto government and that there should have been a salute to the American flag, but it appears that there was an interposition by our Government; there were communications between our State Department and our chargé in the City of Mexico, representations to the de facto government in Mexico, negotiations and conversations, as to the character of the further amends that should be made. The matter came plainly to be a discussion between the Government of the United States and the de facto government of Mexico. Not about the quality of the act that was done; there is no dispute about that. Not about the obligation to make amends; that was done. Not about the obligation to apologize; the apologies were made. But about the form of further amends, how a salute should be fired, what were the proper and customary obligatory incidents in the way of returning such a salute, and the number of guns which should be fired. It is upon that dispute—upon a dispute between these two Governments about the number of guns that are to be fired and about what the proper custom is as to returning the salute when it is fired—it is upon that dispute that this justification is made to rest in the resolution passed by the other House and in the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

Mr. President, I feel bound to say that while I would never for a moment fail so far as in me lay in preserving the dignity and honor of the flag of the United States, the dispute to which this incident has come seems to be painfully inadequate to the results which are to be drawn from it. If that is all—if there is nothing else except a question of the number of guns and the form and manner of salute—which stands between the hundred million people of the United States and this poor, harried, and distressed people, it seems to me that the occasion is painfully inadequate to the results that are to follow.

Is that all? We learn to-night that Vera Cruz has fallen, that 4 American marines lie dead in that city, and that 21 lie suffering from wounds. Is there nothing but this dispute about the number of guns and the form and ceremony of a salute to justify the sacrifice of those American lives?

O Mr. President, deeply and sincerely as the President of the United States desires to limit the scope of his action, deeply and sincerely as he desires the maintenance of peace, all history and human experience teach us that once lighted the fires of war can not be quenched at will.

It is intervention, technically, but it is war in its essence that we are to vote to justify to-night. How long it will continue, what its results and its incidents will be, no man can state. Men will die, men dear to us will die, because of the action that we are to approve to-night. American homes will be desolate; American women will mourn; American children will go through life fatherless, because of the action that we are to approve to-night; and when those children, grown to manhood, turn back the page to learn in what cause their fathers died, are they to find that it was about a quarrel as to the number of guns and the form and ceremony of a salute and nothing else?

We are to justify. What is the justification? Is there none but that? We, the representatives of the great peace-loving Nation; we, the representatives of the great democracy that prides itself upon demonstrating to the world that democracy can be peaceful and just; we are to justify these acts of war; and is there no justification that we can lay before our countrymen, before the world, before the community of nations, before the judgment seat of history, except our dispute about the number of guns and the form and method of a salute? O Mr. President, how inadequate! How can we justify ourselves if we have no justification but that?

But, sir, that is not all. If it had been all, the President would not have come to the Congress yesterday; if it had been all, we would not be discussing the subject here to-night. Back of the incident, back of the special circumstance which forms the whole of the resolution reported by the committee, there is a great array of facts, a long, dreadful history. Mr. President, if there were nothing else but the incident referred to in the resolution, would the American Government have thought for a moment of treating this poor, weak country in this peremptory way? Such things have happened hundreds of times before. Ignorant subalterns have many and many a time transgressed the limits of propriety, mistaken their duty and their powers, and have done acts which were insults to great governments. It has often occurred in the history of the United States. What have we done; what would we do to-day if a subordinate officer in a port of England or France or Germany or Italy were to mistake his duty, make an arrest of American sailors, as American sailors have been arrested before, and the act were disavowed by the Government he served and an apology were made, and regret was expressed, and an intention to punish him was expressed—what would we do about the form and method of further amends? Sir, in the first place, we would settle the facts.

We are now engaged in signing a series of treaties designed to take in all the world, and already a very large number of nations of the world have signed, under which we agree with them that if there be any dispute about any question of fact a commission shall investigate and report, and no action shall be taken for one year, to allow the report to be made. We find here that, while our admiral reported that the American flag was flying on the boat, the Mexican officer reported to Gen. Huerta that no flag was flying. I believe our admiral, but can we think it strange that Gen. Huerta believed his officer? If there were nothing else—if this were all—should not that question of fact be determined by peaceful means?

The question of the proper, appropriate, and customary form and method of a salute is a matter of precedent and the usage of nations. It is the universal custom of civilized nations to present in diplomatic communications the precedents, the authorities showing that the custom contended for by one country is the true custom and that the other country is mistaken. In the case that I suppose, of such an incident occurring in a port of France or Germany or England or Italy, sir, we would have presented our facts, investigated the facts, made certain and clear the facts, presented the authorities upon precedent and custom, and by peaceable and friendly communication would have reached a result.

If that were all, that is what we would do. If this be all, is this Nation of a hundred millions, the richest upon earth, with its mighty power, to treat poor, weak, bankrupt, downtrodden, distressed, despairing Mexico in any less kindly and just a way? If this be all, how can we, in the arrogance of power, justify treating this weak neighbor with a peremptory harshness that we would not think of using toward a powerful nation?

Mr. President, What I have said is what the good people of our country and of the world will think if we finish our work to-night by the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee. There is no justification for us there. No; by the expression of one thing, the dispute about the salute, we commit ourselves to the exclusion of all other justifications. We commit ourselves to a condemnation that will weigh heavily upon the heart of many a good American who loves his country and her honor, and which, as time goes on and the judgment of the world and of the future is made up, will grow darker and darker.

But, Mr. President, it is not all; it is not all. There is matter of justification; and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has sought to lay it before the people of America and of Mexico and of the community of nations by the recital in the substitute resolution which he offers. What is it? It is that lying behind the insult to our flag by this poor, ignorant subordinate are years of violence and anarchy in Mexico. Lying behind it are hundreds of American lives sacrificed, millions of American property destroyed, and thousands of Americans reduced to poverty to-day through the destruction of their property. Lying behind it is a condition of anarchy in Mexico which makes it impossible to secure, by diplomatic means, protection for American life and property in that country. Lying behind it is a condition of affairs in Mexico which makes that country incapable of performing its international obligations.

The insult to the flag is but a part—the culmination, if you please—of a long series of violations of American rights, a long series of violations of those rights which it is the duty of our country to protect—violations not, for the most part, of government, but made possible by the weakness of government, because through that country range bands of freebooters and chieftains like the captains of free companies, without control or responsibility. Lying back of this incident is a condition of things in Mexico which absolutely prevents the protection of American life and property except through respect for the American flag, the American uniform, the American Government.

It is that which gives significance to the demand that public respect shall be paid to the flag of the United States. There is our justification. It is a justification lying not in Victoriano Huerta or in his conduct alone, but in the universal condition of affairs in Mexico. The real object to be attained by the course which we are asked to approve is not the gratification of personal pride; it is not the satisfaction of an admiral or a Government; it is the preservation of the power of the United States to protect its citizens under those conditions.

If we omit from the resolution that shall be passed to-night all reference to the matters that are enumerated in the substitute, we omit the real object which forms the only justification for action. Without that, sir, upon the showing of the resolution reported by the committee we would be everlastingly wrong. With the facts that are enumerated in the substitute, the action of the United States will rest with becoming sense of proportion and national dignity upon adequate foundation and cause.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] has observed, in effect, that the substitute resolution thunders in the index. Ah, Mr. President, the capture of Vera Cruz, the death of American citizens, the wounds and sufferings of men who lie there to-night demands something more than formal inducement. The recitals of the substitute resolution are weak in the face of death and wounds and sufferings of Americans in Vera Cruz. No less than the substitute resolution avers can justify us.

The conclusion of the substitute resolution, sir, is the same as that of the other. It justifies the President in the same course of conduct which the committee resolution justifies, but it gives grounds. It gives substantial grounds. It gives grounds creditable to the United States and adequate for the proposed action, instead of leaving this momentous movement of a great naval and military power to rest upon no justification but a dispute with a weak and helpless adversary about number of guns and the proper ceremonies of a salute.

Mr. President, I thought it was proper, indeed, that the speech of Mr. Root, referred to by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] should be read into the RECORD following the remarks made by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield for one moment?

Mr. SMOOT. I will.

Mr. FALL. As this matter has come up and as the Senator from Utah has so properly, it seems to me, called attention to the remarks of the Senator from New York at that particular time, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD with the remarks which he has just read the remarks of the President of the United States made at the Brooklyn Navy Yard on May 11, 1914, as showing that he then agreed absolutely with the remarks of the Senator from New York made on this occasion and had apparently forgotten the reason which he gave to the Congress of the United States in asking justification of his acts. On that occasion he said:

So, while we are profoundly sorrowful, and while there goes out of our hearts a very deep and affectionate sympathy for the friends and relatives of these lads who for the rest of their lives shall mourn them, though with a touch of pride, we know why we do not go away from this occasion cast down, but with our heads lifted and our eyes on the future of this country, with absolute confidence of how it will be worked out. Not only upon the mere vague future of this country, but upon the immediate future. We have gone down to Mexico to serve mankind, if we can find out the way. We do not want to fight the Mexicans. We want to serve the Mexicans if we can, because we know how we would like to be free and how we would like to be served if there were friends standing by in such case ready to serve us. A war of aggression is not a war in which it is a proud thing to die, but a war of service is a thing in which it is a proud thing to die.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator.

I voted against the resolution, and I did so for the very reasons stated by the Senator from New York. Not only that, but I believe to-day that all he said upon that occasion was logical and true and justified his vote and the votes of the Senators who voted as he did. Circumstances that have happened in Mexican affairs since the passage of the resolution prove the wisdom of the position taken at the time by him. I believed then, and I believe now, that it would have been better for our country if, when passing the resolution, we had named the reasons why we sent our marines into Vera Cruz, rather than to have passed a resolution which was false upon its face in not stating what were the real reasons for such action. The President of the United States ordered our Navy to Vera Cruz and marines were landed before ever the resolution was acted upon by the House or by the Senate; but it developed later that one reason why the Navy was ordered to Vera Cruz was to stop a certain shipment of ammunition to Gen. Huerta. That ammunition was landed a few days afterwards, but it did not bring to life the 19 American marines who had lost their lives.

Mr. President, so that the American people may have both of the speeches of ex-Senator Root, referred to by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and be able to read them both in connection with what the Senator from Illinois has said, I ask that I may insert in the RECORD the remarks of ex-Senator Root, delivered at New York recently, to follow my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EX-SENATOR ROOT'S SPEECH.

"Gentlemen of the convention, we are entering upon a contest for the election of a President and the control of government under conditions essentially new in the experience of our party and of our country. The forms and methods which we are about to follow are old and familiar, but the grounds for action, the demand of great events for decisions upon national conduct, the moral forces urging to a solution of vaguely outlined questions, the tremendous consequences of wisdom or folly in national policy, all these are new to the great mass of American voters now living. Never since 1864 has an election been fraught with consequences so vital to national life. All the ordinary considerations which play so great a part in our presidential campaigns are and ought to be dwarfed into insignificance.

"For the first time in 20 years we enter the field as the party of opposition, and, indeed, it is a much longer time, for in 1896, in all respects, save the tariff, the real opposition to the sturdy and patriotic course of President Cleveland was to be found in the party that followed Mr. Bryan.

"It is our duty as the opposition to bring the Democratic Party to the bar of public judgment, to put it upon its defense so far as we see just and substantial grounds to criticize its conduct, and to ask the voters of the country to decide whether that party, organized as it is, represented as it has been since it came into power, has shown itself competent to govern the country as it should be governed, and whether its spirit, its policies, and its performance are the best that the American people can do in the way of popular self-government.

"In the field of domestic affairs some facts relevant to these questions had already been ascertained when in August, 1914, the great European war began. During the year and a half of Democratic control of government in a period of profound peace there had been a steady decrease in American production, in exports, and in revenues, and a steady increase in imports and expenditures. Enterprise had halted. New undertakings no longer made their appearance. Established business ceased to increase its facilities or enlarge its fields of action.

LABORING UNDER TARIFF MISFIT.

"The great productive industries of the country, the farmer, the miner, the lumberman, the manufacturer, were laboring under a misfit tariff devised by the Democratic Party in a spirit of suspicion, distrust, and hostility toward American business enterprise; and, with the disturbance of these great basic industries, transportation and commerce had become dull and despondent.

"The Democratic tariff had been framed upon an avowed repudiation of all protection, however moderate and reasonable; and because all protection was repudiated, practically all information from competent witnesses as to the effect new provisions would have upon business was rejected. The Tariff Commission created under Republican legislation to ascertain the facts upon which tariff laws should be based was driven out of office and no substitute was provided.

"With self-satisfied complacency, the Democratic Congress assumed that the theory of a tariff for revenue only was a satisfactory substitute for knowledge of business conditions in the framing of a customs law, and they made a tariff which stopped the development of business along all the great lines of production and also failed to produce revenue. The men who represented the Democratic Party in Washington had been so long declaiming against those whom they considered the beneficiaries of the protective tariff that their hostility extended to American business itself and to the men who conducted it. All profitable enterprise was under suspicion. Government had no sympathy with it, no desire to promote it, no sense of responsibility to protect it. There was a nervous dread lest somebody should make money. Envy of business success and the phrases of the demagogue were potent elements in the framing of legislation and the administration of the laws.

"It was with just cause that the enterprise of the country halted, timid and irresolute, because it felt and feared the hostility of government.

"The great war has not changed the lesson which we had already learned when it began. It has but obscured further demonstration. It has caused an enormous demand for some things which the United States is able to produce in large quantities, and in these lines of production, while other industries still languish, there have been extensive employment of labor, great exports, and a great influx of money. But this is temporary, it must soon cease, and when the factories have stopped and their laborers are no longer employed we must deal with a situation for which wise forethought should make provision.

WAR HALTED FOREIGN COMPETITION.

"More important still, the war has paralyzed the peaceful industries of all Europe, and has stopped that competitive foreign production which in July, 1914, had already entered American markets to supersede American products under the tariff law of 1913. The war has thus given to American products an immunity from competition far more effective than any possible protective tariff.

"But that is temporary, and when the war is over, when foreign production begins again, the American market, compared with impoverished Europe, will be more than ever before the object of desire and effort, and we shall become the dumping ground of the world to the destruction of our own industries unless that is prevented by a wise and competent government.

"But it is not from domestic questions that the most difficult problems of this day arise. The events of the last few years have taught us many lessons. We have learned that civilization is but a veneer thinly covering the savage nature of man; that conventions, courtesies, respect for law, regard for justice and humanity are acquired habits, feebly constraining the elemental forces of man's nature developed through countless centuries of struggle against wild beasts and savage foes.

"We have been forced to perceive that a nation which fulfills the conditions on which alone it can continue to exist, which preserves its independence and the liberty of its people, and makes its power a shield for the rights of its citizens must deal with greed and lust of conquest and of power and indifference to human rights. We have seen that neither the faith of treaties nor the law of nations affords protection to the weak against the aggression of the strong.

WE CAN NO LONGER LIVE ALOOF.

"We have begun to realize that America, with its vast foreign trade, with its citizens scattered over the whole earth, with millions of aliens upon its soil, with its constantly increasing participation in world-wide efforts for the benefit of mankind, with a thousand bonds of intercourse and intimacy uniting it to other nations, is no longer isolated; that our Nation can no longer live unto itself alone or stand aloof from the rest of mankind; that we must play some part in the progress of civilization, recognize some duties as correlative to our rights.

"For the first time within the memory of men now living the international relations of the United States, long deemed of trifling consequence, are recognized as vital.

"How can this Nation, which loves peace and intends justice, avoid the curse of militarism and at the same time preserve its independence, defend its territory, protect the lives and liberty and property of its citizens? How can we prevent the same principles of action, the same policies of conduct, the same forces of military power which are exhibited in Europe from laying hold upon the vast territory and practically undefended wealth of the new world? Can we expect immunity? Can we command immunity? How shall we play our part in the world? Have selfish living and factional quarreling and easy prosperity obscured the spiritual vision of our country?

"Has the patriotism of a generation never summoned to sacrifice become lifeless? Is our Nation one, or a discordant multitude? Have we still national ideas? Will anybody live for them? Would anybody die for them? Or are we all for ease and comfort and wealth at any price?

"Confronted by such questions as these and the practical situations which give rise to them, is the country satisfied to trust itself again in the hands of the Democratic Party?

NATION IN EXECUTIVE'S HAND.

"When a President and Secretary of State have been lawfully established in office, the power of initiative in foreign affairs rests with them. The Nation is in their hands. Theirs is the authority and theirs the duty to adopt and act upon policies, subject to such laws as Congress may enact within constitutional limits.

"Parliamentary opposition can take no affirmative step—can accomplish no affirmative action. The expression of public opinion can do nothing except as it produces an influence upon the minds of those officers who have the lawful power to conduct our foreign relations. Their policy is the country's policy because it is they who are authorized to act for the country.

"While they are working out their policy, all opposition, all criticism, all condemnation, are at the risk of weakening the case of one's own country and frustrating the efforts of its lawful representatives to succeed in what they are seeking to accomplish for the country's benefit.

"An American should wish the representatives of his country to succeed, whatever may be their party, unless there be wrong against conscience. However much he may doubt the wisdom of their course he should help them where he can and refrain from placing obstacles in their way. But when the President and Secretary of State have acted, and seek a new grant of power, they and the party which is responsible for them must account for their use of power to the people from whom it came, and the people must pass judgment upon them, and then full and frank public discussion becomes the citizen's duty.

"The United States had rights and duties in Mexico. More than 40,000 of our citizens had sought their fortunes and made their homes there. A thousand millions of American capital had been invested in that rich and productive country, and millions of income from these enterprises were annually returned to the United States not merely for the benefit of the investors but for the enrichment of our whole country and all its production and enterprise.

"But revolution had come, and factional warfare was rife. Americans had been murdered, American property had been wantonly destroyed, the lives and property of all Americans in Mexico were in danger.

WILSON'S DUTY WAS PLAIN.

"That was the situation when Mr. Wilson became President in March, 1913. His duty then was plain.

"It was, first, to use his powers as President, to secure protection for the lives and property of Americans in Mexico, and to require that the rules of law and stipulations of treaties should be observed by Mexico toward the United States and its citizens. His duty was, second, as the head of a foreign power, to respect the independence of Mexico, to refrain from all interference with her internal affairs, from all attempt at domination except as he was justified by the law of nations for the protection of American rights.

"The President of the United States failed to observe either of those duties. He deliberately abandoned them both and followed an entirely different and inconsistent purpose. He intervened in Mexico to aid one faction in civil strife against another. He undertook to pull down Huerta and set Carranza up in his place.

"Huerta was in possession. He claimed to be the constitutional President of Mexico. He certainly was the de facto President of Mexico. Rightly or wrongly, good or bad, he was there. From the north, Carranza and a group of independent chieftains were endeavoring to pull down the power of Huerta. President Wilson took sides with them in pulling down that power.

"In August, 1913, through Mr. John Lind, he presented to Huerta a communication which was in substance a demand that Huerta should retire permanently from the Government of Mexico. When Huerta refused, the power of the United States was applied to turn him out.

AID FURNISHED TO CARRANZA.

"Foreign nations were induced to refuse to his Government the loans of money necessary to repair the ravages of war and establish order. Arms and munitions of war were freely furnished to the northern forces and withheld from Huerta. Finally the President sent our Army and Navy to invade Mexico and capture its great seaport, Vera Cruz, and hold it and throttle Mexican commerce until Huerta fell. The Government of the United States intervened in Mexico to control the internal affairs of that independent country and to enforce the will of the American President in those affairs by threat, by economic pressure, and by force of arms.

"Upon what claim of right did this intervention proceed? Not to secure respect for American rights; not to protect the lives or property of our citizens; not to assert the laws of nations; not to compel observance of the law of humanity. On the contrary, Huerta's was the only power in Mexico to which appeal could be made for protection of life or property. That was the only power which in fact did protect either American or European or Mexican. It was only within the territory where Huerta ruled that comparative peace and order prevailed.

"The territory over which the armed power of Carranza and Villa and their associates extended was the theater of the most appalling crimes. Bands of robbers roved the country with unbridled license. Americans and Mexicans alike were at their mercy, and American men were murdered and American women were outraged with impunity. Thousands were reduced to poverty by the wanton destruction of the industries through which they lived.

"The payment of blackmail was the only protection of property against burnings and robbery. No one in authority could or would give protection or redress. It had become perfectly plain that the terms upon which both Carranza and Villa held their supporters were unrestricted opportunities and license for murder, robbery, and lust.

MEXICAN MURDERS CONDONED.

"Yet the Government of the United States ignored, condoned, the murder of American men and the rape of American women and destruction of American property and insult to American officers and defilement of the American flag, and joined itself to the men who were guilty of all these things to pull down the power of Huerta.

"Why? The President himself has told us. It was because he adjudged Huerta to be a usurper; because he deemed that the common people of Mexico ought to have greater participation in government and share in the land, and he believed that Carranza and Villa would give them these things.

"We must all sympathize with these sentiments, but there is nothing more dangerous than misplaced sentiment. Of all men in this world, the man who had vested in him the executive power of the United States was least at liberty to sit in judgment of his own motion upon the title of a claimant to the Mexican presidency or to reform the land laws of Mexico.

"The results of this interference were most unfortunate. If our Government had sent an armed force into Mexico to protect American life and honor we might have been opposed, but we should have been understood and respected by the people of Mexico, because they would have realized that we were acting within our international rights and performing a Nation's duty for the protection of its own people; but when the President sent an armed force into Mexico to determine the Mexican presidential succession, he created resentment and distrust of motives among all classes and sections of the Mexican people.

INTERVENTION ANGERED MEXICANS.

"When our Army landed at Vera Cruz, Carranza himself, who was to be the chief beneficiary of the act, publicly protested against it. So strong was the resentment that he could not have kept his followers otherwise.

"When Huerta had fallen the new government which for the day had succeeded to his place peremptorily demanded the withdrawal of the American troops. The universal sentiment of Mexicans required that peremptory demand, and the troops were withdrawn. Still worse than that, the taking of Vera Cruz destroyed confidence in the sincerity of the American Government in Mexico, because every intelligent man in Mexico believed that the avowed reason for the act was not the real reason.

"The avowed purpose was to compel a salute to the American flag. I will state the circumstances: On the 9th of April, 1914, a boat's crew from the Dolphin landed at a wharf in Tampico to take off supplies. The use of that wharf had been prohibited, and the Mexican officer in charge of the wharf put the crew under arrest, but a higher officer ordered him to hold the boat's crew at the wharf and await instructions. Within an hour and a half the crew was set free. No injury or indignity was suffered except the fact of the arrest.

"Immediate amends were made. The Mexican officer in command at Tampico apologized; Gen. Huerta's government apologized; the officer who made the arrest was himself arrested and his punishment promised.

"The admiral in command of our fleet at Tampico demanded more public amends through a salute to our flag, but there ensued a discussion as to the facts and as to the character of the salute which the circumstances demanded, the number of guns, and how, if at all, the salute was to be returned. While that discussion was pending and avowedly because of that incident the American Government presented a 24-hour ultimatum and landed an armed force and captured the city of Vera Cruz. Three hundred Mexicans were reported killed; 17 United States Marines were killed and many were wounded.

CAPTURE OF VERA CRUZ.

"At that very time Mr. Bryan, with the President's approval, was signing treaties with half the world agreeing that if any controversy should arise it should be submitted to a joint commission and no action should be taken until after a full year had elapsed. This controversy, slight as it was, arose on the 9th of April and on the 21st of the same month Vera Cruz was taken.

"Several times the troops of Carranza and Villa had arrested and imprisoned American consular officers and torn down the American flags from the consulates and trampled them in the mire with indescribable indignities. The proofs were in our hands and no attention was paid to them.

"Many times soldiers of the United States, in uniform, on duty had been shot and killed or wounded across the border by soldiers of Carranza and Villa. More than 50 of them have been killed in this way and no attention has been paid to it. The demand of a salute to the flag was never heard of again after Vera Cruz was captured.

"There is not an intelligent man in Mexico who believes that the dispute about the salute was the real reason for the capture of Vera Cruz. Is there one here who doubts that the alleged cause was but a pretext and that the real cause was the purpose to turn Huerta out of office?

"The people of Mexico, who saw their unoffending city captured by force of arms, 300 of its people slain, their soil violated, a foreign flag floating over their great seaport, upon what they felt to be a false pretense, were misled into imputing a more sinister purpose still—to secure control of Mexico for the United States; and they believed that when the American troops departed that purpose was abandoned through fear. With the occupation of Vera Cruz the moral power of the United States in Mexico ended.

OUR FLAG IS DISHONORED.

"We were then and we are now hated for what we did to Mexico, and we were then and we are now despised for our feeble and irresolute failure to protect the lives and rights of our citizens. No flag is so dishonored and no citizenship so little worth the claiming in Mexico as ours. And that is why we have failed in Mexico.

"Incredible as it seems, Huerta had been turned out by the assistance of the American Government without any guaranties from the men who were to be set up in his place, and so the murdering and burning and ravishing have gone on to this day. After Huerta had fallen and the Vera Cruz expedition had been withdrawn, President Wilson announced that no one was entitled to interfere in the affairs of Mexico; that she was entitled to settle them herself. He disclaims all responsibility for what happens in Mexico and contents himself with a policy of 'watchful waiting.'

"But who can interfere in a quarrel and help some contestants and destroy others and then absolve himself from responsibility for the results? It is not by force of circumstances over which we had no control, but largely because the American administration intervened by force to control the internal affairs of that country instead of asserting and maintaining American rights that we have been brought to our present pass of confusion and humiliation over Mexico.

"And for the death and outrage, the suffering and ruin of our own brethren, the hatred and contempt for our country, and the dishonor of our name in that land, the administration at Washington shares responsibility with the inhuman brutes with whom it made common cause.

AMERICANS DISSATISFIED OVER WILSON'S DIPLOMACY.

"When we turn to the administration's conduct of foreign affairs incident to the great war in Europe we can not fail to perceive that there is much dissatisfaction among Americans. Some are dissatisfied for specific reasons, some with a vague impression that our diplomacy has been inadequate. Dissatisfaction is not in itself ground for condemnation.

"The best work of the diplomatist often fails to receive public approval at the time, and must look to a calm review in the dispassionate future for recognition of its merit. The situation created by the war has been difficult and trying. Much of the correspondence of the State Department, especially since Mr. Lansing took charge, has been characterized by accurate learning and skillful statement of specific American rights. Everyone in the performance of new and unprecedented duties is entitled to generous allowance for unavoidable shortcomings and errors. No one should be held to accomplishment of the impossible.

"The question whether dissatisfaction is just or unjust is to be determined upon an examination of the great lines of policy which have been followed and upon considering whether the emergencies of the time have been met with foresight, wisdom, and decisive courage. If these are lacking as guides, all the learning of the institutes and the highest skill in correspondence are of little avail.

THREE FUNDAMENTAL ERRORS.

"A study of the administration's policy toward Europe since July, 1914, reveals three fundamental errors: First, the lack of foresight to make timely provisions for backing up American diplomacy by actual or assured military and naval force; second, the forfeiture of the world's respect for our assertion of rights by pursuing the policy of making threats and failing to make them good; third, a loss of the moral forces of the civilized world through failure to truly interpret to the world the spirit of the American democracy in its attitude toward the terrible events which accompanied the early stages of the war.

"First, as to power. When the war in Europe began, free, peaceable little Switzerland instantly mobilized upon her frontier a great army of trained citizen soldiers. Sturdy little Holland did the same, and, standing within the very sound of the guns, both have kept their territory and their independence inviolate. Nobody has run over them, because they have made it apparent that the cost would be too great.

"Great, peaceable America was farther removed from the conflict, but her trade and her citizens traveled on every sea. Ordinary knowledge of European affairs made it plain that the war was not begun by accident but with purpose which would not soon be relinquished. Ordinary knowledge of military events made it plain from the moment when the tide of German invasion turned from the Battle of the Marne that the conflict was certain to be long and desperate.

"Ordinary knowledge of history—of our own history during the Napoleonic Wars—made it plain that in that conflict neutral rights would be worthless unless powerfully maintained. All the world had fair notice that, as against the desperate belligerent resolve to conquer, the law of nations and the law of humanity interposed no effective barriers for the protection of neutral rights.

"Ordinary practical sense in the conduct of affairs demanded that such steps should be taken that behind the peaceable assertion of our country's rights, its independence, and its honor should stand power, manifest and available, warning the whole world that it would cost too much to press aggression too far. The Democratic Government at Washington did not see it. Others saw it, and their opinions found voice. Mr. GARDNER urged it; Mr. LODGE urged it; Mr. Stimson urged it; Mr. Roosevelt urged it; but their argument and urgency were ascribed to political motives, and the President described them, with a sneer, as being nervous and excited.

WILSON SHIFTS HIS GROUND.

"But the warning voices would not be stilled. The opinion that we ought no longer to remain defenseless became public opinion. Its expression grew more general and insistent; and finally the President, not leading but following, has shifted his ground, has reversed his position, and asks the country to prepare against war.

"God grant that he be not too late. But the Democratic Party has not shifted its ground. A large part of its Members in Congress are endeavoring now to sidetrack the movements for national preparedness—to muddle it by amendment and to turn it into channels which will produce the least possible result in the increase of national power of defense.

"What sense of effectiveness in this effort can we gather from the presence of Josephus Daniels at the most critical post of all—the head of the Navy Department—when we see that where preparation has been possible it has not been made; when we see that construction of warships already authorized has not been pressed, and in some cases after long delay has not even been begun?

"If an increase of our country's power to defend itself against aggression is authorized by the present Congress, it must be largely through Republican votes, because the Representatives of the Republican Party in Washington stand for the country, no matter who is President; and all the traditions and convictions of that party are for national power and duty and honor.

POLICY OF WORDS WITHOUT DEEDS.

"As to the policy of threatening words without deeds—

"When Germany gave notice of her purpose to sink merchant vessels on the high seas without safeguarding the lives of innocent passengers, our Government replied, on the 10th of February, one year ago, in the following words:

"The Government of the United States * * * feels it to be its duty to call the attention of the Imperial German Government, with sincere respect and the most friendly sentiments but very candidly and earnestly, to the very serious possibilities of the course of action apparently contemplated under that proclamation.

"The Government of the United States views those possibilites with such grave concern that it feels it to be its privilege and, indeed, its duty in the circumstances to request the Imperial German Government to consider before action is taken the critical situation in respect of the relations between this country and Germany which might arise were the German naval forces, in carrying out the policy foreshadowed in the admiralty's proclamation to destroy any merchant vessel of the United States or cause the death of American citizens.

"* * * If such a deporable situation should arise, the Imperial German Government can readily appreciate that the Government of the United States would be constrained to hold the Imperial German Government to a strict accountability for such acts of their naval authorities and to take any steps it might be necessary to take to safeguard American lives and property and to secure to American citizens the full enjoyment of their acknowledged rights on the high seas."

"By all the usages and traditions of diplomatic intercourse these words meant action. They informed Germany in unmistakable terms that in attacking and in sinking vessels of the United States and in destroying the lives of American citizens lawfully traveling upon merchant vessels of other countries, she would act at her peril.

"They pledged the power and courage of America, with her hundred million people and her vast wealth, to the protection of her citizens, as during all her history through the days of her youth and weakness she had always protected them.

AMERICAN VESSELS SUNK.

"On the 28th of March the passenger steamer Falaba was torpedoed by a German submarine and an American citizen was killed, but nothing was done.

"On the 28th of April the American vessel Cushing was attacked and crippled by a German aeroplane.

"On the 1st day of May the American vessel Gulflight was torpedoed and sunk by a German submarine and two or more Americans were killed, yet nothing was done.

"On the 7th day of May the Lusitania was torpedoed and sunk by a German submarine and more than one hundred Americans and eleven hundred other noncombatants were drowned.

"The very thing which our Government had warned Germany she must not do, Germany did of set purpose and in the most contemptuous and shocking way. Then, when all America was stirred to the depths, our Government addressed another note to Germany.

"It repeated its assertion of American rights and renewed its bold declaration of purpose. It declared again that the American Government 'must hold the Imperial German Government to a strict accountability for any infringement of those rights, intentional or incidental,' and it declared that it would not 'omit any word or any act necessary to the performance of its sacred duty of maintaining the rights of the United States and its citizens and of safeguarding their free exercise and enjoyment.'

"Still nothing was done, and a long and technical correspondence ensued, haggling over petty questions of detail, every American note growing less and less strong and peremptory, until the Arabic was torpedoed and sunk and more American lives were destroyed, and still nothing was done, and the correspondence continued until the allied defense against German submarine warfare made it unprofitable and led to its abandonment, and the correspondence is apparently approaching its end without securing even that partial protection for the future which might be found in an admission that the destruction of the Lusitania was forbidden by law.

OUR CORRESPONDENCE FUTILE.

"The later correspondence has been conducted by our State Department with dignity, but it has been futile. An admission of liability for damages has been secured, but the time for real protection to American rights has long since passed. Our Government undertook one year ago to prevent the destruction of American life by submarine attack, and now that the attempt has failed and our citizens are long since dead and the system of attack has fallen of its own weight, there is small advantage in discussing whether we shall or shall not have an admission that it was unlawful to kill them.

"The brave words with which we began the controversy had produced no effect, because they were read in the light of two extraordinary events. One was the report of the Austrian ambassador, Mr. Dumba, to his Government that when the American note of February 10 was received he asked the Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, whether it meant business, and received an answer which satisfied him that it did not, but was intended for effect at home in America.

"The other event was the strange and unfortunate declaration of the President in a public speech in Philadelphia the fourth day after the sinking of the Lusitania that 'a man may be too proud to fight.'

"Whatever the Austrian ambassador was in fact told by the Secretary of State, the impression which he reported was supported by the events which followed. Whatever the President did mean, his declaration, made in public at that solemn time, amid the horror and mourning of all our people over the murder of their brethren, was accepted the world over as presenting the attitude of the American Government toward the protection of the life and liberty of American citizens in the exercise of their just rights, and throughout the world the phrase 'too proud to fight' became a by-word of derision and contempt for the Government of the United States.

UNDERSEA ATTACKS RENEWED.

"Later, in another theater of war—the Mediterranean—Austria, and perhaps Turkey also, resumed the practice. The Ancona and then the Persia were destroyed, and more Americans were killed.

"Why should they not resume the practice? They had learned to believe that, no matter how shocked the American Government might be, its resolution would expend itself in words. They had learned to believe that it was safe to kill Americans—and the world believed them.

"Measured and restrained expression, backed to the full by serious purpose, is strong and respected. Extreme and belligerent expression, unsupported by resolution, is weak and without effect. No man should draw a pistol who dares not shoot.

"The Government that shakes its fist first and its finger afterwards falls into contempt. Our diplomacy has lost its authority and influence because we have been brave in words and irresolute in action.

"Men may say that the words of our diplomatic notes were justified; men may say that our inaction was justified; but no man can say that both our words and our inaction were wise and creditable.

"I have said that this Government lost the moral forces of the world by not truly interpreting the spirit of the American democracy.

"The American democracy stands for something more than beef and cotton and grain and manufactures; stands for something that can not be measured by rates of exchange, and does not rise or fall with the balance of trade.

"The American people achieved liberty and schooled themselves to the service of justice before they acquired wealth, and they value their country's liberty and justice above all their pride of possessions.

"Beneath their comfortable optimism and apparent indifference they have a conception of their great Republic as brave and strong and noble to hand down to their children the blessings of freedom and just and equal laws. They have embodied their principles of government in fixed rules of right conduct, which they jealously preserve, and, with the instinct of individual freedom, they stand for a government of laws and not of men.

MORAL LAWS AND NATIONS.

"They deem that the moral laws which formulate the duties of men toward each other are binding upon nations equally with individuals. Informed by their own experience, confirmed by their observation of international life, they have come to see that the independence of nations, the liberty of their peoples, justice and humanity can not be maintained upon the complaisance, the good nature, the kindly feeling of the strong toward the weak; that real independence, real liberty, can not rest upon sufferance; that peace and liberty can be preserved only by the authority and observance of rules of national conduct founded upon the principles of justice and humanity, only by the establishment of law among nations, responsive to the enlightened public opinion of mankind.

"To them liberty means not liberty for themselves alone, but for all who are oppressed. Justice means not justice for themselves alone, but a shield for all who are weak against the aggression of the strong. When their deeper natures are stirred they have a spiritual vision in which the spread and perfection of free self-government shall rescue the humble who toil and endure from the hideous wrongs inflicted upon them by ambition and lust for power, and they cherish in their heart of hearts an ideal of their country loyal to the mission of liberty for the lifting up of the oppressed and bringing in the rule of righteousness and peace.

"To this people the invasion of Belgium brought a shock of amazement and horror. The people of Belgium were peaceable, industrious, law-abiding, self-governing, and free. They had no quarrel with anyone on earth.

"They were attacked by overwhelming military power; their country was devastated by fire and sword; they were slain by tens of thousands; their independence was destroyed and their liberty was subjected to the rule of an invader for no other cause than that they defended their admitted rights. There was no question of fact; there was no question of law; there was not a plausible pretense of any other cause.

CRUSHING OF BELGIUM.

"The admitted rights of Belgium stood in the way of a mightier nation's purpose, and Belgium was crushed. When the true nature of these events was realized the people of the United States did not hesitate in their feeling or in their judgment. Deepest sympathy with down-trodden Belgium and stern condemnation of the invader were practically universal.

"Wherever there was respect for law it revolted against the wrong done to Belgium. Wherever there was true passion for liberty it blazed out for Belgium. Wherever there was humanity it mourned for Belgium.

"As the realization of the truth spread it carried a vague feeling that not merely sentiment but loyalty to the eternal principles of right was involved in the attitude of the American people. And it was so, for if the nations were to be indifferent to this first great concrete case for a century of military power trampling under foot at will the independence, the liberty, and the life of a peaceful and unoffending people in repudiation of the faith of treaties and the law of nations and of morality and of humanity—if the public opinion of the world was to remain silent upon that, neutral upon that, then all talk about peace and justice and international law and the rights of man, the progress of humanity, and the spread of liberty is idle patter—mere weak sentimentality: then opinion is powerless and brute force rules and will rule the world.

"If no difference is recognized between right and wrong, then there are no moral standards. There come times in the lives of nations as of men when to treat wrong as if it were right is treason to the right.

"The American people were entitled not merely to feel but to speak concerning the wrong done to Belgium. It was not like interference in the internal affairs of Mexico or any other nation, for this was an international wrong. The law protecting Belgium which was violated was our law and the law of every other civilized country.

BELGIAN INVASION VIOLATED OUR LAW.

"For generations we had been urging on and helping in its development and establishment. We had spent our efforts and our money to that end. In legislative resolution and Executive declaration and diplomatic correspondence and special treaties and international conferences and conventions we had played our part in conjunction with other civilized countries in making that law. We had bound ourselves by it; we had regulated our conduct by it; and we were entitled to have other nations observe it.

"That law was the protection of our peace and security. It was our safeguard against the necessity of maintaining great armaments and wasting our substance in continual readiness for war.

"Our interest in having it maintained as the law of nations was a substantial, valuable, permanent interest, just as real as your interest and mine in having maintained and enforced the laws against assault and robbery and arson which protect our personal safety and property.

"Moreover, that law was written into a solemn and formal convention, signed and ratified by Germany and Belgium and France and the United States, in which those other countries agreed with us that the law should be observed.

"When Belgium was invaded that agreement was binding not only morally but strictly and technically, because there was then no nation a party to the war which was not also a party to the convention.

"The invasion of Belgium was a breach of contract with us for the maintenance of a law of nations which was the protection of our peace, and the interest which sustained the contract justified an objection to its breach.

"There was no question here of interfering in the quarrels of Europe. We had a right to be neutral and we were neutral as to the quarrel between Germany and France, but when as an incident to the prosecution of that quarrel Germany broke the law which we were entitled to have preserved, and which she had agreed with us to preserve, we were entitled to be heard in the assertion of our own national right.

AMERICAN DUTY PLAIN.

"With the right to speak came responsibility, and with responsibility came duty—duty of government toward all the peaceful men and women in America not to acquiesce in the destruction of the law which protected them, for if the world assents to this great and signal violation of the law of nations, then the law of nations no longer exists and we have no protection save in subserviency or in force.

"And with the right to speak there came to this, the greatest of neutral nations, the greatest of free democracies, another duty to the cause of liberty and justice for which America stands; duty to the ideals of America's nobler nature; duty to the honor of her past and the hopes of her future; for this law was a bulwark of peace and justice to the world; it was a barrier to the spread of war; it was a safeguard to the independence and liberty of all small, weak states.

"It marks the progress of civilization. If the world consents to its destruction the world turns backward toward savagery, and America's assent would be America's abandonment of the mission of democracy.

"Yet the American Government acquiesced in the treatment of Belgium and the destruction of the law of nations. Without one word of objection or dissent to the repudiation of law or the breach of our treaty or the violation of justice and humanity in the treatment of Belgium, our Government enjoined upon the people of the United States an undiscriminating and all-embracing neutrality, and the President admonished the people that they must be neutral in all respects in act and word and thought and sentiment.

"We were to be not merely neutral as to the quarrels of Europe, but neutral as to the treatment of Belgium; neutral between right and wrong; neutral between justice and injustice; neutral between humanity and cruelty; neutral between liberty and oppression.

"Our Government did more than acquiesce, for in the first Lusitania note, with the unspeakable horrors of the conquest of Belgium still fresh in our minds, on the very day after the report of the Bryce commission on Belgian atrocities, it wrote these words to the Government of Germany:

"'Recalling the humane and enlightened attitude hitherto assumed by the Imperial German Government in matters of international right, and particularly with regard to the freedom of the seas, having learned to recognize the German views and the German influence in the field of international obligation as always engaged upon the side of justice and humanity. * * *'

UNITED STATES MISREPRESENTED.

"And so the Government of the United States appeared as approving the treatment of Belgium. It misrepresented the people of the United States in that acquiescence and apparent approval. It was not necessary that the United States should go to war in defense of the violated law. A single official expression by the Government of the United States, a single sentence denying assent and recording disapproval of what Germany did in Belgium would have given to the people of America that leadership to which they were entitled in their earnest groping for the light.

"It would have ranged behind American leadership the conscience and morality of the neutral world. It would have brought to American diplomacy the respect and strength of loyalty to a great cause. But it was not to be. The American Government failed to rise to the demands of the great occasion. Gone were the old love of justice; the old passion for liberty; the old sympathy with the oppressed; the old ideals of an America helping the world toward a better future; and there remained in the eyes of mankind only solicitude for trade and profit and prosperity and wealth.

"The American Government could not really have approved the treatment of Belgium, but, under a mistaken policy, it shrank from speaking the truth. That vital error has carried into every effort of our diplomacy the weakness of a false position.

"Every note of remonstrance against interference with trade, or even against the destruction of life, has been projected against the background of an abandonment of the principles for which America once stood, and has been weakened by the popular feeling among the peoples of Europe, whose hearts are lifted up by the impulses of patriotism and sacrifice, that America has become weak and sordid.

POLICY DOUBLY DANGEROUS.

"Such policies as I have described are doubly dangerous in their effect upon foreign nations and in their effect at home. It is a matter of universal experience that a weak and apprehensive treatment of foreign affairs invites encroachments upon rights and leads to situations in which it is difficult to prevent war, while a firm and frank policy at the outset prevents difficult situations from arising and tends most strongly to preserve peace.

"On the other hand, if a Government is to be strong in its diplomacy its own people must be ranged in its support by leadership of opinion in a national cause worthy to awaken their patriotism and devotion.

"We have been following the path of peace. We have been blindly stumbling along the road that, continued, will lead to inevitable war. Our diplomacy has dealt with symptoms and ignored causes. The great decisive question upon which our peace depends is the question whether the rule of action applied to Belgium is to be tolerated. If it is tolerated by the civilized world, this Nation will have to fight for its life. There will be no escape. That is the critical point of defense for the peace of America.

"When our Government failed to tell the truth about Belgium it lost the opportunity for leadership of the moral sense of the American people, and it lost the power which a knowledge of that leadership and a sympathetic response from the moral sense of the world would have given to our diplomacy.

"When our Government failed to make any provision whatever for defending its rights in case they should be trampled upon, it lost the power which a belief in readiness and will to maintain its rights would have given to its diplomatic representations.

"When our Government gave notice to Germany that it would destroy American lives and American ships at its peril, our words, which would have been potent if sustained by adequate preparation to make them good, and by the prestige and authority of the moral leadership of a great people in a great cause, were treated with a contempt which should have been foreseen; and when our Government failed to make those words good its diplomacy was bankrupt.

FAILURE OF DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

"Upon the record of performance which I have tried to describe, will the American people say that the Democratic Party is entitled to be continued in power?

"The defects of the present administration arise from two distinct causes. The first is the temperament and training of the President. The second is the incapacity of the Democratic Party as it is represented in Washington, both in the legislative and in the executive departments, either to originate wise policies or to follow them when proposed by others or to administer them effectively if they are established.

"The Democrats in Congress are never controlled except with a club, and government with a club is always spasmodic and defective.

"These characteristics will not change; President Wilson can not change his nature; the Democratic Party will not change the character of its representatives; and there is no escape from having the same causes of weakness which have controlled our Government for the last three years continued in the future except the withdrawal of power from the Democratic Party. We must not deceive ourselves by assuming that the critical period arising from the great war has passed.

"The real dangers and the real tests of the strength of our institutions lie before us. The most exacting demands upon the wisdom, the spirit, and the courage of our country are still to be made. In this great conflict all forms of government are on trial, democracy with the rest. The principles of national morality are on trial. We must play our part in the universal trial whether we will or no, for upon the result depends directly the question whether our Republic can endure. It can not endure upon wealth alone. Its life is the spirit of free self-government, and if the light of that spirit be quenched in the world the American Republic will disintegrate and fail.

WHAT THE REPUBLICANS OFFER.

"But what are the people to expect if the Republican Party is restored to power?

"This much we can say now:

"They may expect with confidence that their Government will meet the economic situation with which we must deal immediately upon the close of the war, with a policy of moderate but adequate protection to American industry, based upon ascertained and established facts and inspired by sympathy with all honest American enterprise and a desire for the prosperity and happiness of Americans of every calling and in every State.

"They may expect that the Government will be administered with the honesty and efficiency which have marked Republican administrations in the past, in the interest of no section or class, but for the interest of the Nation as a whole and in every part.

"They may expect that the best possible course for the preservation of peace will be followed by a foreign policy which, with courtesy and friendliness to all nations, is frank and fearless and honest in its assertion of American rights, and leaves no doubt anywhere in the world of America's purpose and courage to protect and defend her independence, her territory, and the lives and just rights of her citizens under the law of nations.

"They may expect that their Government will stand for full and adequate preparation by the American people for their own defense.

"The Republican Party loves peace and hates war; it abhors and will never submit to military domination; but it is composed of men who love our country and who deem that the independence, the liberty, the honor, and the opportunity of the American democracy are not merely to be talked about with weak and flabby sentiment, but are to be maintained and safeguarded by the practical power of a virile and patriotic people.

"It is clear-sighted enough to see that preparation for defense must have due relation to the possibilities of attack; that under the conditions of modern warfare much preparation must be made before a possible attack, or all preparation will be impossible after the attack.

FOR SANE PREPAREDNESS.

"The Republican Party stands for a citizenship made competent by training to perform the freeman's duty of defense for his country. It stands for a Regular Army no larger than is necessary, but as large as is necessary to serve as a first line, a nucleus, a source of instruction and of administration for the army of American citizens who may be called upon to defend their country.

"And the Republican Party stands for the gospel of patriotic service to our country by every citizen according to his ability in peace and in war. It stands for a reawakening of American patriotism. It is not content that while the people of other lands are rendering the last full measure of devotion in sacrifice and suffering and dying for their countries, America shall remain alone dull to the call of country and satisfied in the comforts and pleasures of prosperity.

"They may expect that assured readiness for defense will give power to our diplomacy in the maintenance of peace.

"They may expect that the power and will of a united people to defend their country will prevent the application to our peaceful and prosperous land of the hateful doctrine that among nations might makes right, regardless of the rules of justice and humanity.

"They may expect that the manifest potential strength and competency of the Nation will maintain the effectiveness and reality of that great policy of national safety which in the declaration of President Monroe forbade the destruction of our security by the establishment of hostile military powers in our neighborhood.

"They may expect that their Government will not forget, but will ever maintain the principles of American freedom, the duties of America to the peace and progress of the world, and those ideals of liberty and justice for all mankind which above all else make the true greatness of the American democracy."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah as to the resolution seeking this remedy in Mexico, the resolution then pending, whether it is not true that the Senator from New York [Mr. Root] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] voted against it?

Mr. SMOOT. I have stated so, Mr. President, and gave my reason for so voting. I also said to the Senator, if he heard what I said, that I thought the conditions existing in Mexico, and the circumstances as they have happened in that unfortunate country since the speech of ex-Senator Root, have justified the votes cast at that time by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Utah.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH obtained the floor.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hughes	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	James	Page	Smoot
Broussard	Kenyon	Pittman	Sterling
Catron	Kern	Ransdell	Sutherland
Clapp	Lane	Saulsbury	Underwood
Cummins	Lewis	Sheppard	Vardaman
Fall	McCumber	Sherman	Wadsworth
Fletcher	McLean	Shields	Walsh
Harding	Martine, N. J.	Simmons	Warren
Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Ga.

Mr. PAGE. I was requested to announce that Senators ASHURST, LA FOLLETTE, GRONNA, and OWEN are in the Committee on Indian Affairs considering a very important matter. They will return to the Chamber if their presence is necessary to make a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators only have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 21, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 19, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the new day before us, token of Thy presence and continued care. Help us to meet its duties and responsibilities with courage, fidelity, and honesty of purpose that the rectitude of our behavior may be well pleasing in Thy sight and promote the highest interests of the great Nation here represented; and all praise shall be Thine. In the name of the world's great Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 11708) for the purchase of an irrigation project, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, be referred to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks a change of reference of House bill 11708 from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where is it now?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. McCRACKEN. I want it referred to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

The SPEAKER. The bill provides for the purchase by the United States of the King Hill irrigation system, in Idaho, and for the completion thereof by the Reclamation Service. It was by mistake referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object for the present.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Where would the gentleman from New York have the bill go?

The SPEAKER. It is not a question of where the gentleman from New York wants it referred, it is a question of getting it referred under the rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands has no jurisdiction of it; it provides for an appropriation out of the Treasury, and they have no more jurisdiction over it than the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. MANN. It does not relate to public lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so referred.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on preparedness and ways and means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on preparedness and ways and means. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how long he wants to proceed?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Twenty minutes, and if I am not interrupted, I think I can conclude in that time.

Mr. MOON. I have no objection, providing we can get unanimous consent at the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee can make that motion.

Mr. MOON. Pending the request for unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, I move that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Could not the gentleman from Tennessee make the motion afterwards; I think there will be no contest?

Mr. MOON. Very well, I will make no objection, with that understanding.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I want to make the suggestion that the time has come in the business of the House when gentlemen can not be granted leave to address the House in this way.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from New York will permit, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has a matter which he thinks is privileged, but which it is not desired to have a ruling upon at present.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I think no objection will be made to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I really believe that it will save two or three hours.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to state, without objection, that this matter which the gentleman from Pennsylvania wishes to bring up is a far-reaching matter and a very important one, and the Chair, before ruling upon whether it is privileged or not, ought to have an abundance of time to decide it. After a consultation between the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the Chair it was agreed that in order to give time for investigation the gentleman from Pennsylvania should ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. With that intimation, Mr. Speaker, I shall not object, but this statement should be made: We have reached a time in the business of the House when Members can not expect to be granted permission to speak by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I agree to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And I propose to object as long as appropriation bills are ready for consideration.

Mr. MANN. It would take a good deal longer this morning to argue the question whether this is a privileged resolution or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees fully with the remarks of the gentleman from New York.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Pennsylvania withhold his request for a moment until I can call the Speakers' attention to a desire to change the reference of a bill. I did not call it up earlier because I was waiting for the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], the acting chairman, to come in from the Rules Committee. He has just come in.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will withhold my request for the present.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, in order fully to understand the rights of the situation, I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of Senate joint resolution 60, which provides for the raising of a joint subcommittee to be composed of the members of the two Commerce Committees of the respective Houses. I understand reference was made to the Committee on Rules with the idea that it was a House resolution to raise a House committee, and therefore involved a change of the rules. I respectfully submit that this presents no such case. It would be right if that were true. But this joint resolution is for a statutory committee like the Joint Committee on Printing, and it should go, in my judgment, to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as it relates entirely to the regulation of commerce. I am perfectly willing, if it is right that the Committee on Rules should deal with the question, but if, under the rules, it should properly come to us, we are willing to do the work. Whatever is right is all we want done. My friend from North Carolina [Mr. POU] agrees with me in that attitude.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for a rereference of Senate joint resolution 60 to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that he address the House for 20 minutes?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that we will take up the Post Office appropriation bill after the gentleman's remarks are concluded, I make no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. That agreement is generally understood.

THE COLOMBIAN TREATY.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the President has forwarded to the Senate, and the Senate has under consideration, a treaty with Colombia which proposes, by the payment of $25,000,000 of United States money and the remission of certain import duties and charges that would ordinarily and by law accrue to the Treasury of the United States, to make reparation for certain alleged violations by the United States of certain alleged injuries which Colombia is supposed to have sustained through the loss of certain alleged rights in the Isthmus of Panama. This treaty, so directly affecting the morals and the revenues of the United States, is being considered, as we are informed, as if the power to make such a treaty, so involving the money of the people, rested exclusively with the President and the Senate, irrespective of the authority and power specially delegated by the Constitution to the House of Representatives to originate revenue legislation. It is with respect to this apparent invasion of the prerogative of the House that I propose to put the House upon notice.

GUARDING THE PEOPLE'S PURSE STRINGS.

When the framers of the Constitution were endeavoring to provide a satisfactory form of government for the States, which had failed to work successfully together under the Articles of Confederation, they found the direction and control of public funds to be one of their greatest problems. The treaty-making power was to be delegated to the President, acting in conjunction with the Senate, but the raising of revenue was held to be a function of the House of Representatives. As the debates were reported by Mr. Madison, it appears to have been the thought of the framers that the people themselves would not submit to the control of the money-raising power by the Senate. Some very frank expressions upon this subject were recorded. For instance, Mr. Gerry said:

> Taxation and representation are strongly associated in the minds of the people, and they will not agree that any but their immediate representatives shall meddle with their purses.

Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, contended that the small States with one-third of the population would be able to control two-thirds of the whole people; and in this connection Benjamin Franklin is reported as having said:

> If the equality of votes is to be put in its plan, the large States say their money will be in danger.

George Mason, another member of the constitutional convention, opposing the proposition that the Senate should have equal power with the House to originate money bills, said:

> The purse strings should never be put into their hands.

SENATE TO NEGATIVE, NOT ORIGINATE.

The following extract from Mr. Mason's speech is at this time particularly appropriate:

> Again, the Senate is not, like the House of Representatives, chosen frequently, and obliged to return frequently among the people. They are to be chosen by the States for six years; will probably settle themselves at the seat of government; will pursue schemes for their own aggrandizement; will be able, by wearying out the House of Representatives and taking advantage of their impatience at the close of a long session, to extort measures for that purpose. If they should be paid, as he expected would be yet determined and wished to be so, out of the National Treasury, they will particularly extort an increase of their wages. A bare negative was a very different thing from that of originating bills.
> The practice in England was in point. The House of Lords does not represent nor tax the people because not elected by the people. If the Senate can originate, they will, in the recess of the legislative sessions, hatch their mischievous projects for their own purposes, and have their money bills cut and dried, to use a common phrase, for the meeting of the House of Representatives. He compared the case of Poyning's law, and signified that the House of Representatives might be rendered by degrees, like the Parliament of Paris, the mere depository of the decrees of the Senate. But in all events he would contend that the purse strings should be in the hands of the representatives of the people.

WASHINGTON AUTHOR OF FIRST PRECEDENT.

At a very early period in our constitutional history, the House had an opportunity to declare itself concerning its right to participate in the treaty-making power. Congress sought to obtain papers from the White House relating to the treaty with Great Britain in 1795, but President Washington, for reasons given in a message which declared the right of the President and Senate to negotiate a treaty independently of the House of Representatives, declined to comply with the House's resolution, although that resolution had been voted for by Madison, Gallatin, and other strict constructionists of the Constitution. The upshot of this controversy was the passage of a resolution by the House, which declared it to be:

> The constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine an act thereon, as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good.

The point insisted upon by the House was that:

> When a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress.

And, as a matter of fact, the House did subsequently pass a resolution carrying the treaty into effect, which act was approved by the President.

AMPLE PRECEDENTS TO SUPPORT HOUSE.

In a comprehensive and carefully prepared report by John Randolph Tucker, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, March 3, 1885 (Rept. No. 2680, 48th Cong., 2d sess.), numerous precedents are cited to support the House prerogative as insisted upon during the administration of President Washington. He refers to the treaty of Ghent, made with Great Britain in 1815, which contains stitpulations as to duties on imports. President Madison, in his message of transmittal, recommended that Congress enact such legislation as the convention demanded. Congress not only acted as suggested, but provided for a modification of the duties referred to in the treaty. It was contended in the debate that the treaty did not require legislative action, but the House contention was upheld.

President Jackson, it is also pointed out, supported the validity of congressional action with respect to a treaty with France in 1831 which involved commercial regulations and rates of duty. Mr. Tucker also reminds us in his report that the treaty with Mexico was carried into effect by act of Congress.

A SIGNIFICANT SENATE REPORT.

The musty tomes of the Senate contribute valuable information upon this general subject. A discussion having arisen as to a convention with Prussia and the other States of the Germanic Association of Customs and Commerce, Mr. Rufus Choate, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, June 14, 1844, made the following report, which was subsequently adopted by the Senate:

> That the Senate ought not to advise and consent to the ratification of the convention aforesaid.
> In submitting this report the committee do not think it necessary to say anything on the general object sought to be accomplished by the convention or on the details of the actual arrangement, nor to attempt to determine, by the weight and measure of the reciprocal concessions, which Government, if either, has the best of the transaction. These subjects have not escaped their notice, but they propose to confine themselves to a very brief exhibition of another and single ground upon which, without reference to the particular merits of the treaty, they advise against its ratification.
> The committee, then, are not prepared to sanction so large an innovation upon ancient and uniform practice in respect of the department of government by which duties on imports shall be imposed. The convention which has been submitted to the Senate changes duties which have been laid by law. It changes them either ex directo and by its own vigor, or it engages the faith of the Nation and the faith of the legislature through which the Nation acts to make the change. In either aspect it is the President and Senate who, by the instrumentality of negotiation, repeal or materially vary regulations of commerce and laws of revenue which Congress had ordained. More than this, the executive department, by the same instrumentality of negotiations, places it beyond the power of Congress to exceed the stipulated maximum of import duties for at least three years, whatever exigency may intervene to require it.

In the judgment of the committee, the legislature is the department of government by which commerce should be regulated and laws of revenue be passed. The Constitution, in terms, communicates the power to regulate commerce and to impose duties to that department. It communicates it, in terms, to no other. Without engaging at all in an examination of the extent, limits, and objects of the power to make treaties, the committee believe that the general rule of our system is indisputably that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong, without abridgement or participation, to Congress. They infer this from the language of the Constitution, from the nature and principles of our Government, from the theory of republican liberty itself, from the unvaried practice, evidencing the universal belief of all, in all periods, and of all parties and opinions. They think, too, that, as the general rule, the representatives of the people, sitting in their legislative capacity, with open doors, under the eye of the country, communicating freely with their constituents, may exercise this power more intelligently, more discreetly, may acquire more accurate and more minute information concerning the employments and the interests on which this description of measures will press, and may better discern what true policy prescribes and rejects, than is within the competence of the executive department of the Government.

To follow, not to lead; to fulfill, not to ordain the law; to carry into effect, by negotiation and compact with foreign Governments, the legislative will, when it has been announced, upon the great subjects of trade and revenue; not to interpose with controlling influence, not to go forward with too ambitious enterprise—these seem to the committee to be the appropriate functions of the Executive.

Holding this to be the general rule upon the subject, the committee discern nothing in the circumstances of this case, nothing in the object to be attained or in the difficulties in the way of obtaining it, which should induce a departure from the rule. If Congress think the proposed arrangement a beneficial one, it is quite easy to pass a law which shall impose the rates of duty contemplated by it, to take effect when satisfactory information is conveyed to the President that the stipulated equivalents are properly secured.

Upon this single ground, then, the committee advise that the treaty be rejected. It may help to reconcile the Senate to this conclusion if they add that they do not regard the stipulated concessions of the foreign contracting power as in any degree equivalent to the considerations by which we obtain them.

PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION.

In numerous Senate and House precedents, as also in judicial decisions and textbooks, the authority of the House in controversy with the Senate over the treaty-making power as it affects revenues has been recognized and sustained, and it is fair to previous Congresses to observe that wherever the House of Representatives has raised the question it has usually been conceded that the approval of the House of Representatives has been essential to the validity of any treaty which proposed to modify or remit duties imposed by law upon imports.

The House derives its power from section 7, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that—

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills—

And this, as is generally conceded, in spite of the treaty-making power granted to the President in section 2, Article II, of the Constitution, which provides that—

He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

In all the precedents and decisions for more than a century the underlying thought has been in harmony with that of the framers of the Constitution, to wit, that the House of Representatives, being closer to the body of the people than the Senate, and being more responsive to the will of the people, should have control and direction of the people's purse strings.

CONFIRMATORY HOUSE REPORTS.

In the third session of the Forty-first Congress, February 27, 1871 (Rept. No. 42), this principle was upheld by a committee of conference on the part of the House, consisting of Messrs. S. Hooper, William B. Allison, and Daniel W. Voorhees, who, after conferring with the Senate committee on a Senate bill to reduce internal taxes—income tax—reported at length against the Senate right to originate money bills, maintaining by resolution that the House had the—sole and exclusive privilege to originate all bills directly affecting the revenue, whether such bills be for the imposition, reduction, or repeal of taxes, subject to the right of the Senate "to propose or concur with amendments, as in other bills."

In the Forty-ninth Congress, second session (Rept. No. 4177), a controversy having arisen over the extension of a treaty with the Hawaiian Islands affecting import duties, the Committee on the Judiciary, headed by John Randolph Tucker, after an exhaustive inquiry, submitted a resolution, declaring that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—can not negotiate a treaty which shall be binding on the United States whereby duties on imports are to be regulated, either by imposing or remitting, increasing or decreasing them, without the sanction of an act of Congress.

The inquiry here related to an extension of a treaty with the Hawaiian Islands, and the President was requested to withhold final action upon the proposed convention until sanctioned by an act of Congress, although the original treaty of 1875 contained the provision that the convention was not to take effect—until a law to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Congress of the United States of America.

THE HOUSE FIRM IN MODERN INSTANCES.

The same question was up again on February 24, 1876—Forty-fourth Congress, first session, Report No. 116—when Fernando Wood, for the Committee on Ways and Means, having considered House bill 612, a bill to carry into effect a convention between the United States and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875, reported, inter alia, that—

The treaty, in consequence of its abolition of the duty now imposed by law in the United States on the articles enumerated in the schedule, requires an act of Congress to carry it into effect. Unlike most of the treaties made with foreign nations, not only the consent of the House of Representatives is required to give it validity, but the proposition to do so must originate there.

Without cumbering the RECORD with additional quotations it is noteworthy that the prerogative of the House has been insisted upon down to the time of the taking over of the Philippines and the freeing of Cuba. A question having arisen as to the validity of certain tariff duties on Philippine imports after the Spanish-American War, the House adopted a resolution, brought in from the Committee on Rules, legalizing and ratifying the collection of certain duties in dispute, it being stated by Mr. Dalzell, who was in charge of the rule, that the act was necessary to remove any question as to the operation of prior treaty agreements.

On January 31, 1902, Mr. Dalzell, from the Committee on Rules, presented to the House a privileged resolution, which was adopted. This resolution, being of comparatively recent date, and having reference to the controversy over Cuban affairs, is quoted in full:

Whereas it is seriously claimed that under the treaty-making power of the Government, and without any action whatever on the part of the House of Representatives or by Congress, reciprocal trade agreements may be negotiated with foreign Governments that will of their own force operate to supplant, change, increase, or entirely abrogate duties on imports collected under laws enacted by Congress and approved by the Executive for the purpose of raising revenue to maintain the Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Ways and Means be directed to fully investigate the question of whether or not the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and independent of any action on the part of the House of Representatives, can negotiate treaties with foreign Governments by which duties levied under an act of Congress for the purpose of raising revenue are modified or repealed, and report the result of such investigation to the House.

THE ISSUE NOT A PARTISAN ONE.

The Democratic leader, Mr. Richardson, of Tennessee, followed up the Dalzell resolution with one which proposed to declare it the sense of the House that a commercial treaty affecting rates of duty would be "an infraction of the Constitution and an invasion of one of the highest prerogatives of the House of Representatives." In view of the passage of the Dalzell resolution, coming as it did from the Republican side of the House, however, the Richardson resolution was ruled out on a point of order, although both parties in debate held to the principle that the House prerogative should not be invaded.

It is not clear what became of the investigation suggested by the Dalzell resolution; but in a report of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, submitted by Senator Cullom, of Illinois, and released from secrecy December 15, 1902, we find, in the very last paragraph, this concession on the part of the Senate:

That each of said treaties be amended by the Senate by inserting therein the following additional provision: "This treaty shall not take effect until the same shall have been approved by the Congress."

This was in December, 1902, after a most interesting discussion in the Senate, in which some of the leading Senators assailed the right of separate action by the President and Senate as to treaties affecting the revenue.

On November 16, 1903, the House took up the bill (H. R. 1921) "to carry into effect a convention between the United States and the Republic of Cuba," signed December 11, 1902, upon which the Committee on Ways and Means, through Mr. Payne, of New York, had submitted a favorable report.

A POSITIVE STAND IN 1902.

This act contained the proviso:

That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed as an admission on the part of the House of Representatives that customs duties can be changed otherwise than by an act of Congress originating in said House.

The Payne report opened up with the statement that—

The enactment of this bill into law is necessary to give effect to the convention providing for reciprocal trade between this country and Cuba. This results not merely because the convention itself provides that it "shall not take effect until the same shall have been approved by the Congress," but because the Constitution gives no power to the President and the Senate to make a convention or treaty changing the rates of revenue. That power is expressly lodged in the Congress. (Sec. 8, Art. I, of the Constitution.) Section 7 of the same article provides that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." It is not intended here to cite authorities or advance reasons on this proposition. The records of Congress abound with unrefuted arguments on the affirmative of this contention, and the practice of Congress has been uniformly in the same direction. The reciprocity treaties with Great Britain in reference to our trade relations with Canada and with Hawaii were by their terms each dependent upon the passage by the Congress of appropriate legislation reducing the duties and making provision for the carrying into effect of their terms. Every treaty requiring the payment of money, from the Jay treaty to the treaty of Paris with Spain, has been referred to the Congress to make the necessary appropriation of money. Foreign countries in making treaties with us are bound to take notice of this requirement of our Constitution, and, whether it is expressed in the treaty or not, the whole matter is subject to the necessary legislation by the Congress.

THE COLOMBIAN TREATY WITHIN THE RULE.

These more recent evidences of the determination of the House of Representatives to stand by its constitutional prerogative as it relates to revenue matters in treaties with foreign nations, together with its uniform action in all preceding controversies, invite a consideration by the House of a resolution introduced by me (H. Res. No. 145):

Directing the Ways and Means Committee to inquire whether the President and the Senate may negotiate a treaty with Colombia modifying or repealing law providing for revenue without action on the part of the House of Representatives, and to report thereon.

The so-called Colombian treaty, to which the foregoing resolution refers, as released from secrecy by the Senate June 18, 1914, after expressing "sincere regret" that any differences should have arisen to mar the cordial friendship of the two nations, apart from agreeing to the payment by the United States to Colombia of $25,000,000 in gold, and in addition to the grant of certain privileges in the use of the Panama Canal free from charges, such as other nations would be called upon to pay, provided in article 2 that—

The products of the soil and industry of Colombia, passing through the Canal, as well as the Colombian mails, shall be exempt from any charge or duty other than those to which the products and mails of the United States may be subject. The products of the soil and industry of Colombia, such as cattle, salt, and provisions, shall be admitted to entry in the Canal Zone, and likewise in the islands and mainland occupied, or which may be occupied, by the United States as auxiliary and accessory thereto, without paying other duties or charges than those payable by similar products of the United States.

OUR REVENUE RELATIONS WITH COLOMBIA.

Later on in the proposed treaty provision is made that "coal, petroleum, and sea salt, being the products of Colombia," shall be transported over the Panama Railway free of charge except as to certain conditions.

Unless we disassociate the Panama Canal Zone from the United States, it is evident that the revenues of the United States, that is to say, "the purse strings of the people," are directly affected by the provisions of the proposed treaty as they have been quoted; and if distinguished Senators and Representatives who have discussed this matter on previous occasions are right as to the contention that it matters not whether the revenues are created or remitted by treaty, then it would seem that the House of Representatives must be consulted before any such treaty as is proposed with Colombia can be held valid.

As to existing revenue relations between the United States and Colombia, the record of imports and exports for 1914—end of fiscal year June 30—should be brought forward. According to the Statistical Abstract, 1914, the exports from the United States to Colombia amounted to $6,786,153. That sum represented the purchases of Colombia from the United States.

It is more important, for a better understanding of the subject in hand, however, that we consider the imports from Colombia, since they represent purchases from that country by the United States. Our total imports in 1914 were valued at $16,051,120, of which $14,641,503 worth of goods were admitted to the United States free of duty. There were dutiable imports from Colombia, however, to the amount of $1,409,617.

THE QUESTION IS UP TO THE HOUSE.

It thus appears that the House of Representatives, the more popular branch of the Legislature, to which the Constitution has delegated the power of originating revenue legislation, has not been consulted with respect to a treaty which evidently can not be validated without its approval.

The resolution to which I have called the attention of the House is designed to institute an inquiry as to whether, in this instance, as in others throughout the whole of our legislative history, the prerogative of the House to originate revenue legislation, or to determine its validity in treaties with foreign nations, shall be asserted and maintained.

OTHER PANAMA CANAL TREATIES CITED.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has been so recently over the matter that he is more familiar with it than I am, and on account of the gentleman's evident familiarity with it I want to ask him if during the Roosevelt administration we did not conclude a treaty with the Republic of Panama which we had just recognized, involving the payment of $250,000 per annum as rental for the Canal Zone, which amount we are now appropriating every year and paying to the Republic of Panama; and is it not true that during the Taft administration we negotiated a treaty with Colombia and also one with Panama at the same time, by which Panama gave up for a term of years this payment of $250,000 per year and agreed that it should be paid to Colombia, and we agreed to that proposition, the treaty also providing for an additional sum of money to be paid out of the Treasury to Colombia in return for certain concessions, certain islands which she proposed to convey to us, which treaty was ratified in Panama, ratified in Colombia, but not ratified in the United States? If that is true, then the Taft administration and the Roosevelt administration also entered into treaties exactly similar to this, so far as the argument of the gentleman is concerned, except that so large an amount was not provided to be disbursed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has put an eloquent speech into his question, and it involves so many things that it can not be answered within the one minute that I have left.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] object to that?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Tennessee. A number of treaties were attempted. The treaty to which the gentleman from Illinois refers in particular, however, I think is that known as the Root-Cortez treaty, which differed materially from the treaty negotiated by Mr. Bryan April 16, 1914.

Mr. RAINEY. Was it not the Hay-Herran treaty that provided——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, the Hay-Herran treaty was not approved by Colombia. Colombia rejected the Hay-Herran treaty, which, if accepted, would probably have settled this whole controversy. If Colombia had been in the proper frame of mind to make a fair bargain, as set forth in the Hay-Herran treaty, the Panama Canal problem would have been easy of adjustment. The gentleman knows very well that Colombia, after debate, rejected the Hay-Herran treaty; and he knows that subsequent to that the Province of Panama declared its independence and was subsequently recognized by other nations as well as by the United States.

NO DIFFERENCE IN PRINCIPLE.

Mr. RAINEY. The Hay-Bunau Varilla treaty provided for the payment of $250,000, did it not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We are now paying Panama $250,000 per annum; yes, but Congress sanctions that. Answering the gentleman's first question, which involves several administrations—and I had not intended to be political at all—I shall refer to what is known as the Root-Cortez treaty and contrast it with the treaty now under consideration by the Senate. The latter is the treaty in which Secretary of State Bryan proposed to raise the limit to $25,000,000 to salve the wounded feelings of Colombia. Colombia did not have the good sense to accept the Hay-Herran treaty, which proposed a just and amicable solution of the canal question, and thereafter, after Panama had declared its independence, was not in the best position to quarrel with the United States. However, it is not the relative merits of these treaties that I have been discussing. I object to the treaty-making power appropriating the public revenues. If any one of these preceding treaties, no matter who was President, contained the same provisions that this particular Bryan treaty contains, that certain import duties payable to the United States shall be remitted, it is obnoxious to the constitutional prerogative of the House to originate revenue legislation. The House ought to have asserted its right against those treaties as it ought to assert its right against this one.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Since no treaty has fallen, because the House did not agree to recognize it, is that an argument against the gentleman's position that the prerogative of the House should be considered?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course not. I am arguing for the right of the House to originate revenue legislation, and I am insisting that it is not the prerogative of the President or the Senate, without the consent or approval of the House, to appropriate money, as is proposed, or to modify and remit tariffs and charges as this treaty proposes to do.

THE HOUSE CAN REFUSE TO APPROPRIATE.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will yield further—in other words when the House agrees to raise the revenue that does not deny its right to refuse?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not at all. The House has a perfect right to reject any appropriation that comes to it from the President or the Senate providing for the expenditure of public money, whether it comes under the treaty-making power or not. At times the House has sent back to the Senate legislation originating there which affected the revenues. It did so in the matter of grain drawbacks when Mr. Payne was at the head of the Ways and Means Committee. If the House pays certain sums, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] indicated a little while ago when he referred to Panama's $250,000 per annum, it is because the House is satisfied to do so.

Mr. RAINEY. Under treaty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But we are doing that with the approval of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RAINEY. We are paying it under a treaty, and the House of Representatives has approved that treaty and paid that $250,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has the approval now of the House of Representatives, but I venture to say the House of Representatives should not so readily give its approval for the payment of the $25,000,000 which Mr. Bryan proposed by treaty we should pay to Colombia. The payment of so large a sum—in addition to the loss of duties on imports is matter for consideration by the House of Representatives, and its prerogative in this regard should be insisted upon. If it is not "the peoples purse strings" will be in danger. If report be true the Nicaragua treaty provides for the payment of $3,000,000, about which the House is not consulted. The House can refuse to make these appropriations if it sees fit to do so.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I understand, the gentleman's principal objection is to the revenue feature of the Colombia treaty?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am addressing my argument to that principally; although I have referred to specific sums.

COMPARISON OF TREATIES INVITED.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is a fact that the Root treaty of January 9, 1909, signed by Mr. Root as Secretary of State, has a similar provision in it as that of the present proposed treaty, and the gentleman's argument is a protest against that as well as the present treaty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I invite the attention of the gentleman to a comparison of those two treaties, section by section, the Root-Cortez treaty and the Bryan treaty.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have them both here.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will not have sufficient time in what is left of my five minutes to indicate the differences in text, but I will put them in the RECORD later if there is no objection. I invite the gentleman's attention to article 3, where "products of the soil and industry of Colombia passing through the canal," and so forth, are freed of toll charges. That was proposed by the Bryan treaty. The Root treaty provided exemption only for similar charges on mail matter passing through.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman put in his speech article 3 of the Root treaty?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My time having expired, I will extend that and other provisions in the RECORD. [Applause.]

THE RESOLUTION OF INQUIRY.

Whereas it is proposed under the treaty-making power of the Government, and without any action whatever on the part of the House of Representatives, or by Congress, to negotiate with Colombia a treaty that will operate to supplant, change, or repeal duties on imports under laws enacted by Congress and approved by the Executive for the purpose of raising revenue: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be directed to fully investigate the question whether or not the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, independently of any action on the part of the House of Representatives, may negotiate a treaty with Colombia by which duties levied under an act of Congress for the purpose of raising revenue may be modified or repealed, and report the result of such investigation to the House.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10484, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10484) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 4, line 23, after the word "messenger," insert "post-office laborer or."

Mr. MOON. On that I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. To which amendment the gentleman from Tennessee has made the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. MOON. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when this paragraph was originally proposed two years ago and this indemnifying fund was extended to those here enumerated, in addition to the railway mail clerks, I called the attention of the House that it left out a most worthy class, namely, the post-office laborers, a class next to the railway mail clerks, who are engaged in the most hazardous employment that is connected with the Postal Service. The House at that time did not see fit to incorporate in the provision the phraseology so as to cover this most deserving class. Here are some 1,400 men employed in the Postal Service, receiving a salary from $720 to $840, who are obliged to carry these big heavy mail bags, weighing 100, 150, to 200 pounds, endangered in their daily work continuously by going up and down elevators and proceeding about trucks, and yet the Government refuses to give them the protection of this very worthy provision. I wish to direct the attention of the Chairman to the fact that even with the amendment reported by the committee they also would not have been included, because they are not in the classified civil-service employment.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. There is a classification bill to cover laborers in the Postal Service before the committee now, which I think the committee intends to take favorable action upon, but it was intended to cover them by this language when this was passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman from Illinois will admit that this phraseology does not cover the laborers nor does it cover other deserving employees in the Postal Service. It should cover chauffeurs who are engaged in the operation of delivery autos, and messengers, and printers, and the like. If we are going to be consistent at all and grant indemnity for injuries to those men who are not in a hazardous employment, such as post-office clerks, rural mail and city letter carriers, and so forth, we certainly should include these deserving men who are not organized as strongly as the postal clerks, the railway mail clerks, and rural-delivery carriers. These poor laborers who are engaged in hazardous employment about the post offices should be cared for as well as the other employees, who have their powerful organizations and their powerful representatives to see that their rights are protected.

I have no objection to throwing the protecting arm around these other employees who are represented here and who have their organizations, but I do say, in all fairness to this House, that the chairman of the committee or anyone should raise no objection to these laborers who have no person to represent them and no powerful organization behind them. I think if you are going to mete out justice, as you intend and as you should, you should withdraw the point of order and allow these men employed in this most hazardous work to come within the purview of this protecting clause.

I will ask whether the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] persists in his position of making the point of order?

Mr. MOON. I am not insisting upon it; no.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman will not.

Mr. SISSON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. On that point, Mr. Chairman, I do not think I have a very good case, and yet it is rather technical in this particular, and I wish to call it to the attention of the Chairman. I do not lay very much stress upon it, and yet we are having under consideration a clause that is now enacted into law with this slight change, that the word "or" has been omitted from the present law in line 23, following the word "clerk." There has been no point of order made whatsoever to the pending paragraph as it now stands. There is a change in phraseology by the omission of that word "or"; otherwise the paragraph stands as it was at the time of its enactment two years ago.

Now, no point of order having been raised on the paragraph as it stands, the question is whether that slight modification of phraseology would be sufficient upon which to hang an amendment that is germane. If this paragraph now before the House is under consideration, then, of course, any germane amendment would be admissible.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Did not the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] make a point of order on this paragraph and call particular attention to line 24? And did not the Chairman rule that the rest of the paragraph, except the language stricken out on the point of order, was in order because it was existing law?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I was very careful and made a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair at the time the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] made his point of order as to what he made his point of order to; and the RECORD bears me out that the Chair stated that the gentleman from Mississippi made his point of order not to the paragraph but to the new language on line 24 up to the word "who." Now, if the language has been changed, and no point of order being made to the paragraph as it now stands, it having been changed in the particular I have indicated, the question is whether that change is sufficient upon which to hang a germane amendment. That is a matter that I submit respecfully for the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, the Chair will recall that I made the point of order on the entire paragraph, and I called the attention of the Chair especially to the line to which the Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think the RECORD will sustain the gentleman's position.

Mr. SISSON. I stated at the time that I did not have before me the bill for the year before last. The bill of last year did not become a law. A resolution continued the bill of the year before last—the Post Office appropriation bill. So, in making my point of order, I intended to make it to all of the new legislation in the paragraph, and stated that I wanted to make the point of order; and the chairman of the committee or some gentleman on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads indicated to me what the new language was. I believe it was the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX]. Then I called attention especially to that line.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman will recollect that I stated in my judgment this was not subjecct to a point of order, except on lines 24 and 25—"or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service."

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Then the gentleman confined his effort to that language, which clearly is subject to a point of order, and I recall now that the Chairman ruled it out of order.

Mr. SISSON. Yes. The Chair sustained the point of order. But if what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] says is true with reference to the present status, so that language as it is now before the Chair and before the committee is under consideration, then he is enlarging upon the language now in the bill and extends the clause to cover employees not now covered in the bill; and that is why he is offering this amendment. And if it does, it is legislation. If it includes more people than are now included in the bill, even though the language to which he directs attention had been subject to a point of order if the Chair's attention was called to it in time—and it would have been if I had had the bill of last year before me, so that I could determine whether it was new legislation or not—and if he enlarges the number of people to whom the money will be paid and broadens the scope of the bill so as to cover employees not now covered in the bill and the language, it becomes legislation, and is subject to a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, to refresh the memory of the Chair as to what took place, as shown by the RECORD, we find the original motion of the gentleman from Mississippi on page 3142, in the right-hand column, near the bottom, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph, and especially to the language in line 24, "or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service who shall be killed while on duty, or who, being injured while on duty, shall die within one year thereafter as the result of such injury."

Nothing further occurs as to that point of order until we come to page 3145, in the right-hand column, up at the top.

Mr. MADDEN. Look at page 3143, on the left-hand column.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. On page 3143, in the left-hand column, in which the chairman of the committee [Mr. MOON] says:

The language is subject to a point of order and no other—"or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service." That is new law.

Then the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] and others go on to discuss the question. Then, just prior to the decision of the Chair, he says:

I have directed my remarks especially to that. Now, that portion of the language to which I make the point of order is the language just read by the gentleman from Tennessee. My own judgment is that when the language is stricken out the section should be amended, and I shall offer an amendment at the proper time putting in the word "salaried" in line 10, making them salaried employees, and also in line 24, making it read "classified civil-service salaried employees."

That shows the intent of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] not to make the point of order against the paragraph, and only to that indicated and which he considered was new language. Then, before the Chairman rules, I call attention to page 3145, at the top, where I directed this inquiry.

To what language is the point of order made?

The CHAIRMAN. On page 4, line 24, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] makes the point of order to the following language: "Or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service."

And the Chair sustained the point of order.

So, it is clear, Mr. Chairman, that no point of order has been made by the gentleman from Mississippi or anyone else to the paragraph as it now stands, after eliminating the clause which has been held subject to the point of order.

I submit to the Chair that the language being different from that in existing law, in that the word "or" is left out as indicated, whether it is now permissible to offer a germane amendment? And as we have the paragraph under consideration, no point of order having been made against the entire paragraph, then I respectfully contend, the language being different, that you can offer a germane amendment, which I have done in this case, and the germane amendment would be held in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] was clearly to the words—

Or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service.

And the RECORD shows that the chairman of the committee conceded the point of order as to that particular language, and it is clearly out of order, and the Chair sustained the point of order. With that language out the paragraph in the bill that we are discussing is exactly existing law. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] calls attention, however, to the omission, after the words "post-office clerk," in the line 23 of page 4, of the word "or." If the word "or" were in there, it would change in no particular whatever the meaning of this paragraph. The word "or" would not add a thing to the comma that is already there. The omission of the word "or" is probably simply a clerical error, and whether it is there or not is a matter of no importance, and it does not affect the sense of the paragraph in the least. The paragraph, the Chair will hold, is exactly the existing law on that subject.

Now, if this clause, just as it is, remains in this bill, and the bill is enacted into law with the clause in it just as it is, it would not change the existing law in the least. If the paragraph now just as it stands were stricken from the bill, and the bill with it out were enacted into law, it would not change existing law in the least. The paragraph as it now stands, being the existing law, adds no more to this bill than if the several lines it occupied were left entirely blank. It perhaps has a value as it stands, however, inasmuch as it carries an appropriation, but it evidently now has no other function in this bill. The only thing that can change this existing law is some amendment to this paragraph; and the amendment the gentleman suggests, of course, would change existing law. The entire paragraph as it originally stood in this bill, with the words "or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service," the entire paragraph, of course, would change existing law, and the entire paragraph would have been subject to a point of order. But the paragraph as it now stands does not change existing law in the least, and, of course, is not subject to a point of order if the committee wants it to remain in there. We undertake to say that the compiler of the statutes probably would not copy it again into the statutes of the United States if this bill should pass with it in. Whether he would or not, it would not make any difference. On account, however, of this appropriation it apparently carries it perhaps ought to be printed again, but for no other reason. The only amendment that the Chair can think of that would not be subject to a point of order would be some amendment which comes under the Holman rule. The Chair is not called upon to pass on that question now.

The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. SISSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is recognized.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, in line 1, after the word "die" strike out the words "within one year."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the policy of the Government has been fixed by this law to pay for the death of employees in the Postal Service who have been killed while on duty or have been injured while on duty, and who die within a certain time thereafter. Now the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LOBECK] the other day cited the case of an employee who was injured upon a railway mail car through no fault of his own and had been confined to his bed for some 14 months. Now, if that employee should die from that injury, under the provisions of this bill no benefit would accrue to his family, because his death occurred more than one year thereafter.

Now, it seems to me that if an employee is injured while on duty and dies as the result of that injury, and the injury occurred through no fault or negligence of his own, the Government should be willing to compensate his heirs or his legal representatives for the benefit of the wife, children, or dependent relatives, irrespective of the time of his death. And I submit that while the point of order has been reserved against this provision, the House might well liberalize this provision of the law. And I trust that the gentleman will not insist upon the point of order which he has reserved.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. BENNET. I would like to be heard in the interest of consistency in ruling. It has been held in this House for years that an amendment which does nothing but strike out language is in order. It was held as recently as when the child-labor bill was before the House. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was in the chair, and there was a colloquy between the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and some other gentleman, who announced that an amendment striking out words was not in order. He took occasion to look it up through the discussion of the bill, and thereafter took five minutes to announce to the House that he had been wrong and that an amendment which simply struck out words from the text of the bill was always in order. That is all that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] proposes, namely, to strike out words.

Now, a particular provision is before the House and any Member has a right to make a motion to strike out a word or two words or three words or any portion of them.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that if the striking out of these words adds to the expense to the Government, it is in order to strike them out?

Mr. BENNET. Yes; and I will call the attention of the Chair to what the ruling was and to what the amendment was. The amendment was offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to strike out certain words and to provide that the products of child labor abroad should be kept out; and the then Chairman correctly ruled, after the concession of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that the amendment was in order, although if an amendment had been offered, as one had been offered quite recently before that, inserting the words "the product of child labor manufactured abroad," that amendment would not have been in order; and the then Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was right both times.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Was not that a case where there was a proposition for a new law pending, whereas here is an existing law, that is on the books, that you want to strike out a part of?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, that does not change the situation at all.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does not the striking out of the word change existing law?

Mr. BENNET. Of course, that is the purpose—to change existing law.

Mr. STEENERSON. Therefore it must be subject to the point of order.

Mr. BENNET. But if I may be indulged on that general line—and I am interested, because I have a similar amendment that I intend to offer—I want to go back to the threshold. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], who is now presiding over the Committee of the Whole, is one of the fairest men in the House, and desires to rule correctly and in accordance with the precedents, I am sure. I want to say to him frankly that when I occupied the position of Chairman of Committee of the Whole in the Sixty-first Congress for a month or so on the railway bill I had to look up the precedents, and I found that the precedents of this House, based on the rulings in Jefferson's Manual, have always been that the change of one single word in an amendment makes a new amendment, because, as Jefferson's Manual says, non constat, but that it was that particular word which caused the rejection of the prior amendment; and if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], who I know wants to rule in accordance with the precedents of the House, will look up the precedents both before my time as chairman and since then, I am quite sure he will find that the change of just one word makes a new amendment, and that the Chair has been prohibited by the practice of the House from saying that the omission of one word, or even the addition or amendment of a comma, is unimportant; that that is the function of the committee and not of the Chair; and that, therefore, this entire provision is a different provision because of the omission of that one single word "or." When I presided over the Committee of the Whole I think I had occasion to overrule a point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to an amendment, and to hold, in strict accordance with the precedents, that the change of one single word in an amendment made it a new amendment, for the reasons I have given.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from New York contend that the introduction of an amendment to a permanent law which will change the law is not subject to a point of order?

Mr. BENNET. Here is what I contend: When this proposition came into the House in the bill it was subject to a point of order because it proposed to enact legislation on an appropriation bill in violation of section 21 of the rules of the House. Any Member could have made a point of order against the whole proposition, but no one did. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] made a point of order to a certain provision, and the chairman of the committee conceded it. There was no discussion, and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole sustained the point of order. Thereafter the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] immediately offered an amendment to the portion of the provision that remained. The precedents of the House on this subject will be found in Volume V, Hinds' Precedents, section 5912 and following, and in Volume IV, section 3823, and the following sections. The latter citation is more appropriate to the question to which I am addressing myself. The precedents are that where a portion of a bill under consideration is legislation on an appropriation bill, and it has been permitted to remain, it may be perfected by a germane amendment. That has been held fifteen or twenty times, as cited in Volume IV, section 2833, and the following sections. And it has also been held in this House that where there was a proposed change of law in the bill, and there was discussion of it, that made the substance of the provision immune from attack under a point of order.

My own belief is that amendments, such as the one offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], are germane; and the Chair will find a decision in connection with a proposition to take the fence away from the space around the Botanical Garden, and another one where a bill was offered changing the compensation of judges, when it was held in order to propose that they should not accept any passes on railroads, because that was germane to the same general subject; and the basic reason why it was germane is that the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin and the legislation in the bill would both be within the jurisdiction of the same committee, although that is traveling rather far afield, and the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is clearly in order, because it is simply a motion to strike out words from a bill, and that has been ruled time and time again to be in order.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has cited in the first place some precedents that relate to appropriation bills where points of order were not made. The other cases he cites are on legislative bills, where the position of the gentleman is correct. But there is a rule of this House which prohibits legislation on an appropriation bill, and this is an appropriation bill; and any amendment that would insert new legislation or change old legislation would be out of order, clearly, under that rule of the House.

Now, suppose you strike out the words "shall die within one year." That would change the whole meaning of this law. That would fix no time limit whatever under which the payment should be made, because when the man died, at any time thereafter, the payment would have to be made. This would be an entire change of the law. Now, the Chair can see readily the distinction between the two. There would be no sense in a rule of the House that there should be no new legislation or change of law on appropriation bills if a Member could come along and move to strike out a line or two of existing law and change the whole law of the land, notwithstanding that rule, upon the theory that he had a right to move to strike out a word. The striking out of a word may mean the whole sense of the subject.

The gentleman said, too, that where an amendment had been offered to existing law in the bill, and objection had not been made thereto, that constituted a parliamentary situation where another amendment could be attached. That was the substance of what he said.

Well, that is true; but while the amendment proposes new law and is stricken out, under the rule the law is left exactly as it was before, and that reasoning, of course, does not apply. Nor can the gentleman find any precedent in Hinds or anywhere else for it.

Mr. STEENERSON. After the new language was stricken out on a point of order, there was no purpose in repeating the existing law in the bill?

Mr. MOON. No.

Mr. STEENERSON. In order to make a short cut, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph. I reserved it in the beginning.

Mr. MOON. The paragraph has been under discussion for some time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first dispose of the point of order made to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will indulge me for a moment, I fear that I should ask pardon of the House for presuming to discuss a point of order at this early stage in my career in this body. The distinguished chairman of the committee has called attention to his interpretation of the rule. I submit this very paragraph must have come into the bill in violation of the rule of the House. But, irrespective of that, I submit that it does not change the law. The law is that if a postal employee meets death while on duty, or is injured and dies from that injury, his heirs shall receive a certain sum of money. The principle of the law is based on the death of the employee. This simply changes the time of compensation. The law fixes the time of payment for death from injury received while on duty. I submit that the liability of the Government is not increased because we simply change the time when compensation for the death resulting from the injury while on duty shall be paid.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is mistaken in saying that a point of order has never been sustained to an amendment to strike language out of an appropriation bill, because such amendments have frequently been ruled out on a point of order. The gentleman does not make the proper distinction between the question of the germaneness of the amendment and the validity of the proposed amendment in an appropriation bill. Of course an amendment is germane always which proposes to strike out any part of the language, but the question of germaneness does not enter into the consideration of this at all. The question here is whether this amendment is in order under the provisions of rule 21. If the Chair will notice, this provision of the bill is a matter of identification. The paragraph ends: "To enable the Postmaster General to carry out the provisions of the above, $234,000." It perhaps would have been better if in submitting the estimates they had identified this legislation in some other way than by repeating it.

The paragraph is not legislation, it is a mere appropriation. But if the contention is correct that you could amend this paragraph of identification by striking out the language proposed, then you could amend it by striking out any other language. For instance, you could strike out where it refers to employees or substitutes hereinafter mentioned the words "hereinafter mentioned," so that it would include all employees and substitutes. You could move to strike out the words "while on duty," and pay it to all employees, regardless of whether they were injured while on duty or not. You could provide for the payment of a permanent salary to any employee of the Government who was relieved and a substitute appointed for him. He could receive the salary because the provisions in the paragraph are restrictive. When you get down to the payment of the $2,000 for those injured in the service the gentleman might move to strike out the provision for those who die within one year as the result of the injury, and pay $2,000 to every railway employee or clerk or other employee. If to strike out language is in order, then you can, by striking out language, change the scope of the appropriation. You could provide under the terms of this paragraph the payment of $2,000 to every post-office employee in addition to his salary. You could provide for the payment of a permanent salary to every employee for whom a substitute was appointed simply by striking out the language. While it might be said that the House would not be likely to do that, that is not the question for the Chair to rule on. It is the duty of the Chair to determine whether the amendment offered in the guise of striking out language changes the law in the same way that inserting language would. It makes no difference to the rule whether it is to strike out or to insert, the question is whether it is authorized by law.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the ground taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is not tenable on an appropriation bill. If the Chair will look at page 5, it provides that "no compensation shall be paid any such employee for any injury occasioned by his own negligence." Strike out the word "no" and you would have a provision for the payment of compensation to an employee for an injury occasioned by his own negligence.

There is a provision that a certain class of employees shall not receive more than $2,000. You could strike out the word "not" and it would read that he shall receive more than $2,000.

Mr. BENNET. If the gentleman will look at page 192 of Jefferson's Manual he will see that his argument is disposed of. The gentleman's argument does not go to the competency of the amendment, but whether it ought to be adopted. That is for the House.

Mr. SISSON. That would be true of any legislation on an appropriation bill. The purpose of the rule is to prevent an appropriation bill absorbing all of the jurisdiction of all of the other legislative committees. If we could legislate upon an appropriation bill, these committees having charge of appropriations could take entire charge of Congress, because they would change existing law whenever it suited them, and you would be thrashing out legislation on appropriation bills constantly and would never get through with the business of the House. So it is in the nature of good administration that that rule was made; but the gentleman's contention now would absolutely abrogate the rule and open up for us another Pandora's box.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Did not the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads attempt to do precisely what the gentleman says could not be done? That is, did they not attempt to legislate by the very language against which the gentleman made the point of order?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; and I prevented them from legislating by making the point of order, just as we are trying to prevent their legislating now by making this point of order.

Mr. BENNET. If that was an attempt on the part of the Post Office Committee, and the gentleman says it was, in which I agree, to legislate, does not that absolutely dispose of the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this language on page 5 is merely descriptive of the appropriation? Did they not attempt to legislate?

Mr. SISSON. But the gentleman entirely loses sight of what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] meant when he said that the language was descriptive, because every appropriation must be appropriated for a specific purpose, and it adds nothing to the law by repeating it in this bill. It takes nothing from the law by repeating the language in this bill, but it simply is a provision which authorizes the Post Office Department to use the amount carried under this item in accordance with the description in the bill, which happens in this case to be the law. In most of the appropriation bills, if you can find a specific designation for a particular character of employee, you can frequently make the appropriation by making it to a certain department, but if you will turn back to the law creating the department you will find there the duties of each of the employees provided for and their salaries fixed. That is for the purpose of shortening the bill. Take, for example, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. If we were compelled to repeat the law in each case as has been done here, you would have the Revised Statutes almost copied in the bill, because there you provide for all of the departments of the Government in the city of Washington. Therefore, for the purpose of being relieved of that enormous burden, the appropriations have been designated by title, not by the repetition of the law, and in this particular case, if they could give terms which could describe perfectly what this appropriation was for, it would not be necessary to repeat the law, so I take it that is what the gentleman from Illinois meant by speaking of this language as descriptive.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Chair to rule on this.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair understands the general rule that a motion to strike out is germane, but that is not the question presented here. This paragraph as it stands now is existing law. This amendment proposes to strike out the words "within one year," contained in the first line on page 5, and that just as materially changes existing law as to add certain words. The Chair thinks it would be a dangerous precedent to establish to permit a committee of the House to write into a bill existing law, and then in Committee of the Whole change existing law by striking out certain portions of it or by adding certain portions. The Chair also thinks it would be an equally bad precedent for a committee of this House to omit a comma from a paragraph of existing law, and then to write it into a bill with the comma omitted, and insist that it was a separate paragraph changing the law, and therefore subject to germane amendments, if no point of order was made at the proper time to the entire paragraph. The Chair thinks it would be equally dangerous for the clerk of a committee, through error, or the printer, through some typographical error, to omit an absolutely unimportant word, like the word "or," which omission adds or takes away nothing at all to or from existing law, no more than the omission of a comma would add or take away, and then to have the committee bring in the existing law incorporated in a bill with a disjunctive or a conjunctive omitted, which changes nothing, and insist that the existing law was so changed as to permit of germane amendments, including the amendment to strike out. The Chair, therefore, for the reasons given sustains the point of order.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I move to strike out of the paragraph all that portion beginning with line 9 on page 4, down to and including the word "negligence," in line 4 of page 5.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 9, strike out all the language of the paragraph down to and including the word "negligence," in line 4, page 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee to reserve the point of order.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. It merely writes into this bill what is now existing law. I do not include the language in lines 4 and 5, on page 5, "to enable the Postmaster General to carry out the provisions of the above, $234,000." That would be proper with a slight amendment.

Mr. MOON. If you strike out "the above," what does that mean?

Mr. CANNON. It is very easy to amend so as to identify the act inside of a single line. Why cumber the bill with nearly a page which merely reenacts the law as it now is?

Mr. MOON. I will state to the gentleman the purpose was this, strictly: We have put into this statute, in order to make it read properly and connectedly, the words "or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service." Now, those words have been stricken out, which leaves the statute just as it was, of course, but we propose to have a rule come in here to put back that language in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof, or the benefit thereof.

Mr. MOON. What language would the gentleman suggest to carry the appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. I would offer an amendment, if the gentleman did not, to enable the Postmaster General to carry out the provisions of this law, identifying the law, $224,000. It is perfectly easy.

Mr. MOON. I do not think it hurts anything to carry the law in this section, and I doubt whether the point of order could now be made on it or not, the whole matter having been discussed.

Mr. CANNON. I am not making the point of order at all. I merely moved to strike out because it is mere leather and prunella, a mere surplusage; that is all. I want to get rid of unnecessary language in copying an act that is now upon the statute book. I have no objection to the appropriation.

Mr. MOON. I understood the gentleman to make the point of order on it.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, not at all.

Mr. MOON. Then we may just as well have a vote.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential amendment to perfect the text, which takes preference over a motion to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 16, after the word "conditional," insert the following: "And the Postmaster General shall have full authority to grant to any employee not to exceed two weeks' sick leave in any one year with pay, and shall not approve or continue any rule or regulation automatically terminating the employment of any such employee by reason of absence, when ill, for a fixed number of days."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for a moment on the point of order.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order; I do not reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York on the point of order.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I do not deem it necessary to repeat the argument which I made on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which applies to this amendment very largely. It seems to me that whenever a committee of this House reports to this House that which is clearly legislation, and, under the rules of the House, that particular legislation remains in the bill, that it is competent for the committee to perfect the legislation by a germane amendment, and I cited the Chair, in a memorandum which I sent in, to some sections of Hinds' Precedents in that regard.

Now, what is the additional ground; that is, that the language is not existing law because of the change of a word, and I read to the Chair from page 192 of the House Manual and Digest, section 459:

It is for the House rather than the Speaker to decide on the legislative effect of a proposition, and the change of a single word in the text of a proposition is sufficient to prevent the Speaker ruling it out of order as one already disposed of by the House.

Therefore, this legislative provision is not existing law. It is different from existing law——

The CHAIRMAN. What section does the gentleman read?

Mr. BENNET. Page 192 of House Manual, section 459; and I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the change of that one word, under the decisions of the House, takes away the power of the Chair to decide that it is a matter of legislation. It is for the House and not the Chair, and this not being the same statute that there is on the statute books, this amendment, if germane, is in order. Now, it is germane, because it relates to the same subject matter, the matter over which the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has the same jurisdiction that it had to report a provision which is substantially what is on pages 4 and 5. Therefore I respectfully submit that the Chair ought to overrule the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. For the reasons given in the prior ruling, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to this paragraph, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending. Is this a preferential amendment?

Mr. HAMLIN. This is a preferential amendment, to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "negligence," in line 4, page 5, insert the following: "Provided, however, That any employee whose claim for compensation under this provision shall be denied by the Postmaster General, said employee shall have the right to an appeal from said decision aforesaid to the Court of Claims.

"That in order to perfect said appeal the claimant shall give to the Postmaster General—within 30 days from the date of notice to said claimant of the decision of the Postmaster General on his claim—notice in writing of his intention to appeal from said decision as aforesaid. Said notice shall be in the form of a written communication directed to the Postmaster General stating the intention of the claimant to appeal from the decision as aforesaid.

"It shall be sufficient notice of an appeal when the claimant shall deposit in the United States mails said written notice directed to the Postmaster General and having attached thereto requisite postage to carry the same.

"Upon filing with the clerk of the Court of Claims of a copy of the notice last above referred to properly verified, together with evidence showing that same was duly deposited, with proper stamps attached, in the United States mails, the Court of Claims shall be possessed of jurisdiction of the said cause and the same shall be docketed in said court, and said court shall proceed to hear and determine the same upon the evidence filed in said case with the Post Office Department, together with such other evidence as either the Government or the claimant may present.

"Immediately upon receipt of notice of intention on the part of the the claimant to appeal from the decision of the Postmaster General, as aforesaid, the Postmaster General shall cause, without any unnecessary delay, to be transmitted to the clerk of the Court of Claims, a copy of his decision in said case, together with all affidavits and other evidence on file in his department in said case.

"The decision of the Court of Claims in said case shall be final and binding on all parties in interest. But the Government shall in no case be liable to any injured employee for a period to exceed one year.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think it is subject to the point of order, but I would ask the gentleman to withhold it.

Mr. MOON. I can not, as it is so clearly subject to the point of order. If the gentleman wants to pass such legislation he should introduce a separate bill. It would take us a week to consider things like that.

Mr. HAMLIN. I shall certainly introduce a separate bill, if the Chair should hold that the point of order is well taken; but I am not inclined to think that it is well taken, and if the gentleman will not withhold his point of order until I can make a statement——

Mr. MOON. I would like to accommodate the gentleman from Missouri, but he sees the impropriety of the chairman of the committee agreeing to an amendment like that on this appropriation bill. It ought to be in a separate bill, and I must insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do, unless the gentleman withholds it.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon the point of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to be perfectly frank with the House, and state that I recognize that my amendment is new legislation; but I also think it comes under the Holman rule, and is therefore in order. I will direct the Chair's attention to the last provision of the amendment:

But the Government in no case shall be liable to any injured employee for a period exceeding one year.

Under existing law, and the law proposed to be enacted by the committee at the present time, it provides that an injured employee may be granted leave of absence for one year at full pay, and if not able to return to work at the end of that time he shall be given a further extension of one year at 50 per cent of his salary. Now, if this amendment is adopted it limits the liability of the Government to an injured employee to one year and cuts out the additional year, which unquestionably reduces the liability of the Government under the provisions of my amendment. And under the Holman rule I am inclined to think for that reason that it would be in order.

Mr. MOON. What would be in order? To have appeals to the Interstate Commerce Commission and everything of that sort?

Mr. HAMLIN. It is in order for the reason that it reduces the liability of the Government under the law in these cases.

Mr. MOON. It does not appear on the face of it.

Mr. HAMLIN. It does not need to appear on the face of the amendment itself. If by any reasonable process of reasoning it appears that it reduces the liability of the Government, it clearly comes under the Holman rule.

Now, I have not in my hands the decision, but I recall it very distinctly, and I call the Chair's attention, that some years ago when we were considering the military bill the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] was in the chair, and an amendment to that bill was offered which clearly covers the very point which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] suggests.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. In just a moment, when I have finished this.

An amendment was offered providing for the reduction from the pay of 15 Cavalry regiments to 10. Somebody made the point of order that that was a change of existing law and therefore new legislation, and, of course, the point of order was contested on the ground of the "Holman rule." The Chair stated in his ruling that while it did not appear upon the face of the amendment itself that it would reduce the cost to the Government, yet the Chair concluded because of the fact that the number of units to be compensated was reduced from 15 to 10, in the natural order of things the effect of it must be to reduce the liability to the Government, and on that basis concluded that the amendment came under the Holman rule, and the point of order was overruled.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If I understand the gentleman's position, it is that if a man files a claim under this law and the Postmaster General allows it, the man may file an appeal then with the Court of Claims, in the hope that it may be disallowed, and thereby save the Government money? That would come under the Holman rule?

Mr. HAMLIN. Of course the gentleman does not understand my position to be that at all. My position is simply this, if the Chair will bear with me a moment: That under the existing law if one of these injured employees applies to the Postmaster General for compensation under existing law the decision of the Postmaster General on his claim is absolutely final, and he, of course, if it is adverse, gets nothing. Now, the object of my amendment is to give to that injured employee a right, if he feels he is injured by the adverse decision of the Postmaster General, to have a court pass upon his case.

Mr. MADDEN. And thereby reduce the cost by having a judgment rendered?

Mr. HAMLIN. It does not increase the cost, and especially when you cut out the second year to employees which is provided by this amendment.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will admit, will he not, if it were not for the Holman rule then his proposed amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir; there is no question about it.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman's amendment should obtain and carry, does not the gentleman contemplate that ultimately there would be considerable litigation in the Court of Claims over a violation of this statute?

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir; I do not think so. That would add no cost.

Mr. COX. How about the witness fees, the lawyers' fees, and the court fees, and so forth?

Mr. HAMLIN. There would be none. I do not think it would result in that at all, for this reason: I think our Postmaster General would be a little more careful in looking into the merits of these different cases, and it is not a question of the amount that he allows. The law fixes that. If he recognizes that a given case comes under the provision of the law, all he has to do is to give the employee one year's leave of absence with pay. It is not a question of whether he gives him $1,000 or $2,000 or $5,000. If my amendment should be adopted I think the Postmaster General would be more careful in passing upon these cases in the matter of whether or not a given case is entitled to come under the provision of the law. He would examine more carefully into the merits of each case, for he would not want to be reversed. If this amendment is not adopted and the Postmaster General disallows his claim the man is denied participation under existing law, and he has no remedy whatever.

Mr. Chairman, if the committee will indulge me just a moment, I do not want to stand here and contend that my amendment is in order unless there is some good reason for it. Yet I feel so strongly upon the merits of the proposition that I wanted to call the attention of the committee to it. I want to recite one incident which directed my attention to this question. There came under my observation——

Mr. MOON. I will suggest to the gentleman that we need time very badly here.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suggest to the gentleman that he can save a great deal of time by giving me five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would prefer to hear from the gentleman simply on that point of order.

Mr. MOON. The Chair has control of the time; I have not.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have said all I care to say on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, then——

Mr. HAMLIN. But I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes not on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes not on the point of order. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. I do not want to object, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wants to talk, but I feel as though he were imposing on us to do that.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not occupied 60 minutes of the time of this House since we convened.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. I have no objection, Mr. Chairman.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I will relate a case that has brought this question to my attention. That there is merit in the amendment which I have offered there can be absolutely no doubt. There was a young man—by name, Roy J. Bennett—employed in the post office in my home city as a clerk. He is now blind—absolutely blind. He filed his application under this law for leave of absence for one year with pay. The evidence on file, with no one disputing it at all, shows that when he went in the office as clerk there he was about the age of 24 or 25. I am not sure as to what date he went in. He was physically sound, and his eyesight was good. He was compelled to work under artificial light entirely, with the result that finally the optic nerve broke down suddenly. He was compelled to cease his services there, was treated by oculists in Springfield and also in St. Louis by specialists, and was told by them finally that he never would be able to see again. Now he is about 26 or 27 years of age and compelled to go through life in absolute darkness, with no hope of ever restoring his eyesight.

He made his application under this law in the regular way to the Postmaster General—and I am not seeking to criticize the Postmaster General. He made his application under this law to the Postmaster General for leave of absence for one year with pay. The evidence showed that he had lost his sight in the service of his Government through no fault of his. There was no dispute about the facts. His claim was turned down. Under existing law he has no remedy whatever, but can only grope his way through life with no consolation, except it be that he may cheer his loneliness by singing "My country, tis of thee."

Now the adoption of this amendment would not help him, but it is just such cases as his that have called my attention to these injustices, and I feel that if we are going to give to these employees any compensation at all, we ought to give them some way in which they can be assured that they will get justice. In other words, we ought not to hold out to them a "loaf" in one hand, and when they reach out to get it, hand them a "stone."

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman think a case like that should come under the provisions of law as it exists?

Mr. HAMLIN. Of course it ought, and, in fact, does come under existing law.

Mr. NORTON. What does the gentleman mean when he says this man was "compelled" to work under artificial light?

Mr. HAMLIN. He was compelled either to resign or to work under those conditions.

Mr. NORTON. The United States did not compel him to work there at all. He could have gone out on a farm, could he not?

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, he could have quit work and gone out and starved, and his wife and children could have starved. Of course no one could compel him to stay there. But it certainly does not come with good grace from us, representing the American people, to stand here and permit such a condition to exist and then say if he did not want to work under these conditions he could quit. To say that he could have quit and did not need to work is beside the point.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is going pretty far on the part of the gentleman to make such a statement as that. What are we doing to bring about a condition of that kind on a man's wife and babies?

Mr. HAMLIN. The conditions are such that he was compelled to work in a way that has destroyed his eyesight, and now he is refused any compensation whatever on the part of this Government, and the gentleman from Tennessee is pressing a point of order against an amendment which, if adopted, would remedy this injustice.

Mr. MOON. We are simply making a condition here, and under the situation we can not possibly meet every isolated case where a man's eyesight or hearing may be affected by his labor.

Mr. HAMLIN. Here is what I am asking for: If the Postmaster General arbitrarily turns down cases of this kind, we want to be able to say to this man, "You have the right to get the judgment of the court as to whether or not you have merit in your case and whether you ought to be permitted to have compensation. We give you the right to an appeal."

Mr. LOBECK. And where the inspectors who make these reports are not the attorney, trial judge, and jury, and report to the Postmaster General, as they have done in numbers of cases?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly. Now, I am not seeking to criticize the present Postmaster General or his predecessors or successors, but this is true——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Every Postmaster General has a pride in holding down the expenses of his department. It is the biggest department in the Government, and he feels that if his annual expenditures for this year exceeds the previous year it is a discredit to him unless he can show that it was due entirely to the natural growth of the office; but to reduce expenses is a "feather in his cap," and it is but natural that he cut out every expense possible in order to make that showing. Such claims as I have been talking about are some of the most available and softest to operate on, for he has only to exercise his discretion and there is no appeal from his decision. He wants to be fair, but I fear he is not always just. If we are going to help these employees, we ought to amend the law so that exact justice shall be done them or else we ought to repeal the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] provides for an appeal from the decision of the Postmaster General by any employee who has a claim for compensation under this provision of the law which is denied by the Postmaster General.

If this amendment is in order and is adopted, employees will have the right to appeal from the decision of the Postmaster General to the Court of Claims. That is the object of the amendment. Of course, it is clearly new legislation. It is sought, however, to invoke the Holman rule. The Postmaster General could deny entirely the claim of an employee for compensation, or he could allow it in part, and in either event the injured employee, if this amendment is adopted, would have the right to appeal.

Then, the amendment proceeds in its other paragraphs to provide a method for appeal. Now, if the decision of the Postmaster General rejects the claim, and an appeal is taken to the Court of Claims, and the Court of Claims allows the claim, that certainly does not reduce the expenditures of this Government in the least. It would add that much to the expenditures. If the claim is allowed in part, and the claimant appeals from the decision, the presumption is that he appeals for the purpose of getting a larger allowance, and if he does get a larger allowance from the Court of Claims, that would add to the expenditures of the Government.

The Chair is clearly of the opinion that in this instance the Holman rule can not be invoked, and the point of order is sustained. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the motion to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi moves to strike out the entire paragraph.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do that for the reason that I do not think the Reilly amendment ought ever to have been adopted.

There is a somewhat peculiar condition existing with reference to employees of the Post Office Department. A certain organization of employees, while having no legal recognition, has a quasi recognition, in that certain officials of that organization in the Post Office Department are given leave of absence and continue to draw their salaries.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman state to the House that men not actually performing service to the Government are drawing salaries?

Mr. SISSON. My information is that that is true.

Mr. MADDEN. Who are these men?

Mr. SISSON. I will give you the name of one, Mr. Frank T. Rogers, president of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks; office of the president, 427 Colorado Building, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Mississippi must know that there is no authority vested in anybody connected with the Post Office Department to give any man in the service leave of absence and pay him compensation. Not only that, but provision is made in this bill and all other bills providing for the conduct of the Post Office Department that when men are absent on leave substitutes shall take their places and be paid from the appropriations made for substitutes.

Mr. SISSON. I am always glad to yield to my good friend from Illinois, as he understands. I do not yield further; but I think he might investigate that matter a little. I think the Post Office Committee might find some facts that would be interesting to them if they would make some little investigation of it. Now, the mails are being flooded with letters. I will not take the time to read them all, because I presume that most of you have received the letters, whether you have read them or not. They relate to certain legislation that they want, and I am going to read the last paragraph of this letter:

I believe our chances for success were never better. Will you do your part? It must be done at once. The sooner your Member of Congress knows that your people are in deadly earnest about this matter, the sooner will the House pass the Griffin bill (H. R. 6915). Get busy.

Fraternally, yours, FRANK T. ROGERS, President.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. In one moment. Now, without taking up the time of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to insert this letter as a portion of my remarks.

Mr. MOON. Let us see what it is before we give the permission.

Mr. SISSON. Then I will read it all. I should not read this letter except that the gentleman requests it.

Mr. MOON. Go on and let us hear it.

Mr. SISSON. This is the letter:

THE PENROSE-GRIFFIN BILLS.

UNITED NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF POST OFFICE CLERKS,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1916.

DEAR FRIEND AND FELLOW CLERK: We are earnestly appealing to every branch of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks to do everything possible to secure the enactment into law of the Penrose-Griffin indefinite leave of absence bills.

In the House the bill, known as H. R. 6915, is fathered by Representative D. J. GRIFFIN, a member of the Post Office Committee, before which the bill is now pending.

In the Senate the bill is known as S. 3081, and is fathered by Senator BOIES PENROSE, a member of the Senate Post Office Committee, to which the bill has been referred. Copies of both bills have been mailed to all branch secretaries.

Each branch should undertake a systematic campaign to arouse local public sentiment in behalf of these bills. Write your own Representative in Congress at once, not only urging him to vote for the bill when it comes before the House but also requesting him to urge the members of the Post Office Committee to report the bill favorably, so that it may be considered by the House at the earliest possible date. Make every effort to induce the clergy, business, and other organizations and prominent individuals in your community to write such letters.

We have reasonable assurances that the committee will make a favorable report if a little more pressure is brought to bear.

Hon. Miles M. Dawson, an actuary of national repute, has advised with us in the preparation of these bills, furnishing us with computations as to cost and other statistics. Mr. Dawson reports that in the first year of operation the bill would cost only $362,250, or only three-tenths of 1 per cent of the total salaries of the employees covered by the bill.

Our last convention adopted a resolution making the necessity for retirement legislation along noncontributory lines our paramount issue.

The National Council of Postal Associations, of which I am the secretary, consisting of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks, the National Association of Letter Carriers, the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association, and the Railway Mail Association, is actively supporting the Penrose-Griffin bills.

The necessity for retiring the superannuates in the Postal Service with a sufficient allowance to protect them against poverty in their declining years is very acute. We have witnessed the reduction in compensation or removal from the service of many faithful old fellow employees. It is our duty to strive to put an end to this cold-blooded manner of dealing with superannuation and to protect ourselves against a like fate, as we, too, shall approach the period of superannuation.

The earnest efforts of your national officers will not avail without the whole-hearted support of every member.

I believe our chances for success were never better. Will you do your part? It must be done at once. The sooner your Member of Congress knows that your people are in deadly earnest about this matter, the sooner will the House pass the Griffin bill, H. R. 6915. Get busy.

Fraternally, yours, FRANK T. ROGERS, President.

Please post.

Now, there are many of these letters. I shall not take up the time of the committee to read them all now. I may read them in the future. Here is a situation where all of the employees of the Post Office Department are organizing and selecting men to prepare bills for them and sending them here. They are not looking after the interests of the taxpayers, not looking after the interests of all the people, but are overriding the recommendations of the department, not only under this administration but under other administrations. They are coming to the Appropriations Committee and, as they plainly state in this letter, bringing pressure to bear upon Congressmen, and in this way bringing about legislation not looking to the general interests of the country, not having the general interests of the people in their hearts and minds, but having in mind the taking care of themselves and hedging themselves about by such rules and restrictions of the administration that it is utterly impossible for the head of the department, if their demands are granted, to give to the people a good and efficient administration. They are doing this for the purpose of protecting inefficiency and insubordination, and if I had the time I would show you some of the bills which have been introduced here which the committee will be called upon to consider.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Would the gentleman deny to the postal employees of this country the right to petition their Congressmen?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely not. I am not denying them that right. When any constituent of mine desires to write me I am glad to hear from him; but when they have organizations that become nation wide, the purpose of which is not to further the interests of the mail service but to further their own salaries and extract from the people of the country more taxation in order that they may have their salaries increased, then I do say that there ought to be some consideration given to the man least thought of in appropriations, the one who finally pays the bill. [Applause.] Now, in some of the letters which I hope to have the opportunity to call to the attention of the committee again they claim that they have brought about this legislation by this activity.

Mr. Chairman, a very small minority of the people of the United States are directly interested in appropriations, except as they affect the amount of taxes they pay; but this small minority, being compact, having one point in view—that of advancing their own interests and their own salaries—they get to be extremely busy. These employees get their positions by virtue of my indorsement or your indorsement. They get them, as a rule, because they are close friends; they get them, as a rule, because they are our political friends. They get busy back at home, and it tends to coerce and drive the Members of Congress into voting for more liberal appropriations for them than they otherwise would.

I realize fully that the rural carriers in my district have been persistent and active, but on all occasions when I have discussed the matter with them, when they have invited me to address the association, I have called their attention to the salaries which they get in comparison with the salaries of the people around them and in their communities. I compare the number of hours that they labor, and then I simply state to them "I want you treated as the city carriers are treated, and that alone I will stand for." Notwithstanding the fact that they have petitioned me and asked me, within the last year or two the rural carriers have at last agreed that the position I take is a just and a fair one; and if the Members of Congress would do likewise, we should come here clothed with our own judgment and would not serve an organization of employees for the purpose of coercion, as that letter indicates——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. May I have one more minute?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. As that letter indicates, asking the clergy to get busy, asking business houses to get busy, asking customers of theirs to get busy and to write their Congressmen at once; that if a little more pressure is brought to bear they will accomplish what they want to accomplish. For that reason I think this legislation is in the wrong direction. I think it finally means the swamping of the Treasury with the demands of the employees of all the other departments of the Federal Government for legislation along this line, and the proper thing to do is to cut off the head here. When it first started with the Reilly amendment it was a small thing, peering up out of the dust; but now it is stretching out its legs, and its wings are beginning to be seen. For that reason it is a move in the wrong direction, not in the interest of good administration, not in the interest of economy, and not in the interest, I think, of good government in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the compensation law to postal employees, known as the Reilly bill, is existing law, and if the gentleman's motion should prevail that law would not be repealed. I ask the gentleman would he have a law on the statute books which is positive in its character requiring an appropriation to carry it out and then have Congress refuse to give the appropriation?

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman vote with me under the Holman rule to change the law?

Mr. FINLEY. I will not. The gentleman's motion means nothing if it succeeds. He would simply strike out the whole paragraph, including the appropriation, and there would be a law on the statute book requiring an appropriation annually to pay for the injured postal employees and the deaths of those covered by that law, but there would be no money to pay it with. That is all the gentleman's motion amounts to.

Mr. SISSON. Then I will make a motion at the proper time to repeal this law entirely and make it under the Holman rule.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman can introduce a bill for that purpose if he chooses.

Mr. SISSON. I shall not introduce a bill, because an amendment will lie under the Holman rule.

Mr. FINLEY. We will see about that when we reach it. There is nothing in the gentleman's motion.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] made serious charges in connection with his motion, and I submit that no such charges ought to be made by any Member on this floor without presenting the facts. He has made the statement that the Post Office authorities are granting leave of absence to men and paying them salaries while away from work. There is nobody to blame for that except the Post Office authorities if it exists. If the charge he makes be true, it is an indictment against the authorities running the Post Office Department, and this House and the country is entitled to know the facts.

Now, these men who are employed by the Post Office Department are United States citizens. They have the same rights as any other citizen in the land. The fact that they become Government employees does not take any of their rights away. There was a time when their rights were taken away by Executive order, but that order was repealed by the Congress of the United States. Authority was given to these men to exercise their ordinary rights as citizens of America, and giving them the right to appeal to Congress, or to any committee of Congress, or to any Member of Congress for anything that is legitimate. The letter written by Mr. Rogers, read by the gentleman from Mississippi, is a letter that Mr. Rogers had a right to write. The gentleman from Mississippi says it creates a sentiment. Of course, that was what it was intended to do, and that is the way to get legislation. That is the way we get legislation on every subject over which we have jurisdiction. The people who are engaged in the manufacturing industries endeavor to create a sentiment in their favor; those in the importing business endeavor to create a sentiment in their favor.

The gentleman from Mississippi when he runs for Congress writes letters to his constituents, no doubt endeavoring to create a sentiment in his favor. Does anybody deny him that right? Why should not he accord the same right to every other American citizen? [Applause.] Is it any more a crime for a man to write a letter to a Member of Congress asking him to vote for something for his benefit than it is for the Member of Congress to write a letter to his constituents asking them to continue him in office at $7,500 a year? Not a bit. [Laughter and applause.]

We ought to be fair. These men are patriotic men, they are working at low salaries. They are doing the best work that can be done by men. They are always obedient to the law. They do everything they can to promote the efficiency of the department under which they are engaged. They ask a pension. Is that a crime? I never heard that it was. Every great business institution in America pensions its men, if it makes money enough to permit it to do so, except the Government of the United States, which is less reasonable with its employees than are private individuals.

The great body of American citizens all over the land, in whatever calling they may be engaged, have a perfect right to petition Congress or a Member of Congress. We are the servants of these people; and if we want to become their masters, all we have to do is to resign and take our places in the ranks and follow the citizenship, and then we have a right to dictate to men who sit on the floor of the House. But to think it is a crime for a man to advocate a case where he believes there is justice behind the advocacy is absurd, and statements of that sort ought not to be made on this floor. [Applause.]

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the utterance of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and to differ with my equally distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], whose leanings for economy are perhaps to be commended, but who lacks that broad view necessary in the consideration of this question. Heretofore it has been my pleasure—and I considered it my duty—to take exception to the autocratic and despotic order issued by Theodore Roosevelt, when he was President of the United States, putting a gag in the mouths of the postal employees of this country. I wish to reaffirm to-day my opposition to that kind of conduct on the part of any President of the United States. A modification of that order was made by President Taft, and, as a Democrat, I glory in the fact that to a Democratic Congress was accorded the privilege of liberating the post-office employees and permitting them, as free citizens of this Republic, to bring their complaints to Congress. This is the place for them to bring their complaints. We may as well bid good-by to republican institutions if we can say that any set of men are to be denied the right to petition. As an old post-office clerk myself, I can bear testimony to the efficiency of these men who give faithfully of their service and who perform their duties to the satisfaction of the people. I do not believe that their salaries are any too large, and, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] says, the way to secure legislation is not by the petty petitioning of a single individual but by the united petition of these post-office employees. God speed their efforts; make them all the bigger in number, just and reasonable in their nature, and bring them here to Congress to get what they believe to be their rights.

Standing upon this floor, I take pleasure also in commending the efforts of the postal employees, that great body of American citizens, to bring about a change in the way of compensation for their labors. One of the most heart-rending sights, I think, that come to the eyes of any man is to see an old, faithful letter carrier or clerk, perhaps of 50 years' service and needing his monthly wage, told that his services are no longer required. I believe they should be pensioned, and I hope the sentiment will grow in Congress. I hope the time will come when, freed from greater responsibilities, some President of the United States may recognize the burning importance of this question and bring to these faithful employees and all of the employees of the Government a pensionable status by which they can be retired on a sufficient allowance to bless their declining days. That will make room for the younger blood down below, and it will make a better and more efficient public service. I know that there are a great many men who hesitate even to consider this proposition; but it has been shown that it would be an economical one. Congress should not hesitate to follow in the path blazed out by the great corporations of the country. It is only right and proper that we should compensate these men for what they are doing and then hold out to them the promise of some better thing when old age comes than to be kicked into the street. Oh, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that I commend him from the bottom of my heart for the stand he has taken to-day for these men, who are honest, who are faithful, who are deserving of every consideration. Economy is all right, but I think frequently it is misplaced. There is no better way for the Government to progress, there is no better way for the people to go ahead in this world, than to give consideration to those who perform the daily tasks faithfully and well. I am glad I have had the opportunity to be here to add my word of encouragement to men who are seeking merely their rights under the Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I merely desire to call attention to the recklessness of the position of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. He certainly could not fully comprehend what he is attempting to do in moving to strike out this whole paragraph. This paragraph provides that the Postmaster General may employ other employees when those charged with duty are sick or absent. Yet the gentleman is entirely willing to take away from the Post Office Department by this motion the power to employ others to perform the duty of carrying the mail. I am sure the gentleman did not think of that when he made his motion. I think there has been no one in this House who has been more persistent and more energetic in furthering the claims of the rural carriers in the United States. The gentleman has aided in raising the salaries of these employees. I thought myself that they were getting quite enough before the last raise, but this House had a better judgment and raised the figure to what it is now. The gentleman has always bowed with profound reverence at the throne of the rural carrier. Let him go back to Mississippi and tell the rural carriers that while he worships at their throne, when they are alive, he is unwilling, when they are dead, killed in the line of performance of their duty, to give to their poor widows and children $2,000 to protect them from want, and that he made a motion to strike that item out of the bill. [Applause.] I am sure the gentleman is too kind-hearted to want to prevent the widows of the officials of the Government from getting some benefit for their faithful performance of duty when they are killed in the line of duty. I do not believe he would be willing to say to them that he would deny them that poor privilege.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad indeed to hear several gentlemen on the Post Office Committee defend the Reilly amendment. That amendment was not inserted in the law on the suggestion of the Post Office Committee, however, and it shows that we all have a tendency to make progress. The Reilly amendment was gotten into the bill through parliamentary maneuvering, and over the objection and in spite of the objection of my distinguished friend from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee, and other members of the committee.

Mr. MOON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Reilly amendment was not in the Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. MANN. No; it was not.

Mr. MOON. Why, it was in, I think, and was stricken out on a point of order at one time.

Mr. MANN. Not the Reilly amendment.

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not at all. A provision was in the bill, which went out on a point of order. I give the committee credit for bringing in what they did. I helped to arrange the matter of the Reilly amendment, to have the amendment offered unawares to the gentlemen who were opposed to it. They immediately proposed an amendment to it, which took it beyond the point of order. I am not seeking to criticize the Post Office Committee—far from it. We are all in the position of making some progress in thought along the line of making provision for men who are injured in the public service, and we will reach the time after a while when we will make provision for men who have served in the public service so long that it is proper that they be retired on account of age and paid something toward taking care of them.

A civil pension list. When I first came into the House the idea was treated with horror by nearly everybody here, and I think it is treated with horror now by a majority of those present in the House. I have no doubt the time will come before very long. I am very glad that the Reilly amendment was inserted in the bill. However, Mr. Chairman, I arose principally for the purpose of saying a word concerning Frank T. Rogers, whom the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] rather attacked. Mr. Rogers is not a constituent of mine, but he has for years, to a more or less extent, at least, represented the post-office clerks in regard to legislation. I have frequently met and talked with Mr. Rogers in Washington, and of all the men whom I have ever talked with who were representing any class of employees of the Government or people outside in regard to legislation, I think that Frank T. Rogers is the fairest, the most reasonable man whom I have talked with concerning legislation which he was endeavoring to influence or affect in behalf of a number of other people. [Applause.] He never asks, so far as I have observed, unreasonable things. He has always been willing, as far as he was concerned, to consider matters from the governmental point of view as well as from the point of view of the employees, and I do not think it is desirable for us to throw stones at men like Rogers and possibly have them replaced by very radical men who want impossible things done and then abuse us because we can not do impossible things. I hope that he will retain a position where he can talk to Members of Congress on behalf of the post-office employees for many years, as he will be an aid, not an obstruction, to the work that we ought to do. [Applause.]

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, for several years, ever since coming to Congress, I have been in favor of pensioning those who are injured in the service or those who have worked a long time in the service and were too old to continue. I have given the subject considerable study, and believe it only fair to the veterans in civil service.

A few days ago I was in the Post Office Department, and was shown the work on the upper floor in the money-order department. I was shown a room where there were about 20 or 25 aged employees, and I believe that every one of them, from the information I received, was over 75 years of age, men and women still in the employ of the Government, who therefore could not do the efficient work they performed in younger days and were given light work, and, in fact, all are pensioners on the Government. A short time ago I was in the accounting department of the Navy. I found in that department 225 persons, 75 persons of whom were over 70 years of age. Now, if those people could be retired on a reasonable pension and younger persons engaged in their places one-half the present number could do the work, as I was informed by the chief in charge. There is a time coming when we will have to take care of the old people if we are to have good, efficient service. The American telephone and telegraph companies of this country are to-day taking care of their people who are injured in their employment and those who are too old, and last year it cost them quite a large sum; but the telegraph and telephone companies are more than pleased, because it pays to do so.

And, as I say, these old men and old women who have been 20, 30, 40, and even 50 years in the service ought to be taken care of and younger blood take their places who can and are able physically to give more efficient work than these old people who have always given good, honest, faithful service to Uncle Sam. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the motion that this section be repealed. I make that motion under the Holman rule, because it unquestionably reduces and retrenches expenditures.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not make a motion. He has to submit an amendment.

Mr. SISSON. Well, I move, Mr. Chairman, that page 4 be amended by repealing the section beginning on line 9 and ending on line 5 with the figures "$234,000."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that is not an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repeal the paragraph on page 4 beginning with line 9 down to and including line 5 on page 5.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order, is not an amendment, and that you can not repeal a provision in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; if the gentleman desires it, I will read the language I desire repealed.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman must submit his amendment. I ask that the gentleman reduce his amendment to writing, as is the provision under the rule. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman shall have time to do so. It is not fair to the clerks——

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I did not care to take up the time of the committee by taking the time to prepare the amendment. I could cut it out of the bill and put it in proper shape if the gentleman insists on it. I simply want to make the motion in the language in which it is made here, and if the gentleman does not object, I think really that the language which I have offered and which has been stated from the Clerk's desk will repeal the section; but I do not want to take up the time of the committee and ask the indulgence of the committee in order to prepare the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if an amendment is offered to be voted upon, it is the right of the Members of the House to have the specific proposition presented, and it is not the province of the Clerk, after an amendment is defeated, to prepare an amendment and insert it in the engrossed bill.

Mr. SISSON. I am not doing that. But we have been discussing this paragraph for two days, and every Member of this House is thoroughly familiar with every word of this section which I desire to have repealed.

Mr. MANN. No one is familiar with the gentleman's amendment, not even the gentleman himself yet, because it has not been reduced to the proper form.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the motion of the gentleman is so meager, indefinite, and uncertain as not to be intelligble at all. He asks us to repeal a provision here in an appropriation bill. Why, the proposition will apply to the Revised Statutes. Let the gentleman tell us what statute he proposes to repeal and what part he proposes to repeal.

Mr. SISSON. That is exactly the reason I had asked that it be put in this form, for the simple reason that I did not desire to detain the committee until I could get the exact——

Mr. MOON. No; the gentleman is mistaken; it is not that it would detain the committee, but the gentleman did not have it before him.

Mr. SISSON. I had intended to make the motion to strike out, until the gentleman raised the question a while ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it is possible to repeal any part of this bill until it is enacted into law.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, this is the exact language of the law—the language which I ask to be repealed. The section which I wish to repeal is in this exact language in the law, and it has been repeatedly stated by the Chair that it is the exact language of the law, after the point of order was sustained to the new language. Now, that is the clause that I desire to repeal, and under the Holman rule, and if I reduced the question to writing and sent it to the Clerk's desk and indicated the particular act, I could not get it more intelligible before intelligent men than it is now.

Mr. MANN. We are not intelligent enough to understand it.

Mr. MOON. The motion to strike out that section has been voted down once.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that if the existing motion prevailed, it would not change existing law in the least. The only paragraph we have in this law as it stands is that which carries with it an appropriation. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SISSON. Would the Chair hold at this time, if this paragraph is passed, that either at the conclusion of this bill or at some subsequent moment in the consideration of the bill an amendment would be in order repealing this section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair prefers not to rule upon that question at all now. I presume, by unanimous consent, we could return to the paragraph.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that for the present we pass the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the paragraph be passed for the present. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to postmasters, $31,000,000: Provided, That hereafter the respective compensation of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, graded in even hundreds of dollars, and payable in quarterly payments, to be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster General from their respective quarterly returns to the Auditor for the Post Office Department, or copies or duplicates thereof to the First Assistant Postmaster General, for the calendar year immediately preceding the adjustment.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is reserved on the paragraph and the gentleman's amendment will not be in order until——

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized to discuss the paragraph.

Mr. STEENERSON. The unexpended balance under this item last year was $373,621, and the estimate is $250,000 in addition, making a sum of $623,621.

Mr. MOON. I did not hear the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEENERSON. It is not my fault. I am speaking in stentorian tones. [Laughter.]

It is an increase of $623,000 over the rate of expenditure for last year. I want to call attention to the fact that the total revenues of the department for the last fiscal year were very nearly $700,000 less than the year before. The compensation of postmasters, just appropriated for in this section, is based upon the receipts except in a few cases of first-class post offices. And, inasmuch as the receipts have fallen off, it is hard to understand why the appropriation should be over $600,000 in excess of the appropriation for the last fiscal year.

I call attention to the fact that the fourth-class offices' salaries are established as follows: First, $50 per quarter, 100 per cent; next, $100 per quarter, 60 per cent; next, $200 per quarter, 50 per cent; and all over $200, 40 per cent to the postmaster.

We have presidential offices where the receipts are——

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. FINLEY. As I understand the gentleman, he is discussing the salaries of the fourth-class postmasters?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am discussing the salaries of all postmasters.

Mr. FINLEY. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Is not the sole purpose to change the time for adjusting the salaries of the first, second, and third class postmasters to the 1st of January?

Mr. STEENERSON. This is an appropriation for all postmasters' salaries, and the second-class postmasters receive a salary of $2,000 where the receipts are between $8,000 and $9,000, and then on up to $2,900. So you observe the salary is largely determined by the receipts of the office. Now, the explanation that I divined for this peculiar situation, this increase of salaries where there is a decrease in receipts, in the face of the law which I have just referred to, fixing the salary on the amount of the receipts, is to be found in the parcel-post development. And in order that that may be understood by the committee, I will send to the Clerk's desk a clipping from a newspaper referring to an office in Alaska where they are shipping ore by parcel post.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HUGE SHIPMENTS OF ALASKA TUNGSTEN SENT OUT BY PARCEL POST.

If anybody happens to notice a drifting cloud of sulphurous smoke to the northward, he can account for the phenomenon by assuming that Alaskan "dog punchers" who drive the mail teams between Cordova and Fairbanks are expressing their views on the injustice of things in general. The European war, the United States postal authorities, and two crafty and lucky miners of Fairbanks seem to have combined to make life a burden to the mail carriers.

Fifty tons of tungsten concentrates, which is badly needed in Pittsburgh and other places where armor plate and other forms of tough steel are manufactured, is being shipped from Fairbanks by parcel post. The concentrates have a value of $140,000. Johnson & Ewers, from whose property it is being shipped, will buy $12,000 worth of parcel-post stamps to make the shipment, and the Government will pay $122,600 to have it delivered.

At first blush it would look as if Uncle Sam were going to book a losing of $110,600, but the wily gentlemen who made the mail contracts in his behalf attended to that matter. The real burden will fall on the mail carriers.

The Alaskan mail carriers, figuring there would be not more than 200 to 300 pounds of mail each trip, made their figures correspondingly low, and everything ran smoothly until a few days ago, when, according to news received from Fairbanks to-day, Johnson & Ewers received an offer from a Pittsburgh chemical firm, offering $2,800 a ton for winter delivery of tungsten concentrates. They decided to ship 50 tons. It is being delivered at the Fairbanks post office at the rate of 4,800 pounds a week, the amount of mail which can be shipped out of Fairbanks each week.

With the exception of the mail carriers, everybody hailed the news of the shipments with considerable glee. Besides giving work to a number of miners during the winter, the shipment of the concentrates will keep the Fairbanks post office—threatened with a reduction in rank—in the second-class division. But if anybody wants to become unpopular with the mail carriers, all they have to do is to mention the word "tungsten."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. MOON. I ask that all debate close in five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have a point of order pending. I wish to discuss a proposition which is new legislation. I really wish to obtain information about the legislation proposed.

Mr. MOON. We will be glad to give you any we have.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STEENERSON. Now, it states there that the post office at Fairbanks will be raised to the second class by reason of these ore shipments, which will involve an expenditure, taken out of the postal receipts, of some thousand or two thousand dollars, and then, although they have a contract, as stated there, to carry the mail to Cordova, which is on the seaboard, at so much per annum, limiting the amount of mail to 4,800 pounds a week, yet if the mail is permanently increased in the next year it will be a more expensive contract, of course. Therefore they are now paying $126,000 a year to carry by dog train in the winter from Fairbanks to Cordova these ore shipments, and from Cordova to Seattle they pay $65,000 to one company and $86,000 to another company, and from Seattle they carry 2,800 miles, this tungsten, to Pittsburgh, which at the ordinary railway mail pay would amount to 14 cents a pound after they get it into Seattle. It will involve, in my estimation, a loss to the Government of four or five dollars to every dollar they receive in postage, and a very large percentage of it goes, as you see, to increase the salary of the postmaster up there, by reason of this extraordinary sale of postage stamps to carry this ore.

This is not an isolated case. I am told that where there are fourth-class offices farm produce is purchased by the postmasters in order to increase their salaries. I was told by a farmer in Virginia the other day that out in the Blue Ridge

Mountain region, where there are many fourth-class post offices, the staple crop in the fall is chestnuts, and they put them up in 50-pound sacks, and the postmaster, who has a salary of $50, has a monopoly of that business, because he gets nearly all the receipts for the sales of postage stamps to carry these chestnuts at 54 cents a sack, and it all goes into his own pocket and the United States Government does not get a cent.

That is the reason why, according to my conjecture, while the total postal receipts fell off last year, the compensation of postmasters increased. We find that the salaries of postmasters are increased over the rate of expenditure last year by $600,000, when they ought to be at least a million dollars less. That is the explanation that I have been able to conjecture for this condition. I do not assert it as a fact, but it is the only explanation I can give. No explanation was given at the hearings of the committee by the department officials.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota withdraws the pro forma amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the ostensible purpose to be accomplished by this amendment, but in reading it, the doubt came to my mind whether, under the phraseology here, the Postmaster General would not have authority to change the salaries of all postmasters of the respective grades. I direct the attention of the Chairman and the members of the committee to the phraseology as it is incorporated in the bill, that—

Hereafter the respective compensation of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, graded in even hundreds of dollars, and payable in quarterly payments, to be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster General.

That phraseology might bear the construction that the Postmaster General would be vested with the authority to change the present basis of pay of all the postmasters of the country.

Mr. MOON. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that if he had read a little further he would see that the salaries are to be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster General "from their respective quarterly returns to the Auditor for the Post Office Department."

Mr. STAFFORD. The authority is given here in language quite definite that the Postmaster General has the authority to fix the salaries—the salaries "to be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster General."

Mr. MOON. The gentleman stopped short there. The law provides the manner in which it shall be ascertained.

Mr. STAFFORD. This new law?

Mr. MOON. No. This is old law.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not say anything in this bill to the effect that the basis of pay should be as now fixed by law; but you are delegating here to the Postmaster General, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. MOON. This is not new law. It was carried in the last appropriation bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. That never became a law.

Mr. MOON. I am speaking of the one that did become a law.

Mr. TILSON. Is the gentleman sure of that?

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask if the gentleman is willing to remove the ambiguity. I believe I have the floor. I would like to correct the position of the Chairman in saying that this is not the law. I have before me the law as it existed for the fiscal year 1915, and it did not carry any such provision. It was merely recommended.

Mr. MOON. I believe the gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman have any objection to clearing up the ambiguity by accepting an amendment, to follow the word "postmasters," in line 11, "at the rate now fixed by law"?

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman thinks it will make it any stronger, I have no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. It would remove the ambiguity. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his reservation.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. I want to ask this question: What change does the new legislation effect in the existing law? I can not find anything in the hearings. It appears that the committee did not have sufficient time to make an index of the hearings on this bill so that a member of the committee could find anything.

Mr. MOON. It provides that the salaries shall be paid in even hundreds and paid in quarterly payments instead of monthly payments.

Mr. NORTON. What change is that over existing law?

Mr. MOON. It changes from uneven payments to even payments and to quarterly from monthly payments.

Mr. NORTON. Is that the only change made?

Mr. MOON. I think that is the only material change.

Mr. NORTON. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman withdrew it.

Mr. MOON. He withdrew the point of order, and the question has been discussed. I make the point that it is now too late.

Mr. CANNON. A point of order has been reserved or pending ever since you commenced.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Dakota reserve the point of order?

Mr. NORTON. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from North Dakota reserves the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to know as to the compensation of postmasters—$31,000,000.

The next paragraph reads:

For compensation to postmasters, $31,000,000: Provided, That hereafter the respective compensation of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, graded in even hundreds of dollars.

I take it that the word "hereafter" would follow all through the following paragraphs, for compensation of assistant postmasters and compensation of clerks and employees.

Mr. MADDEN. It relates only to that one paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think so.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. MOON. Only to the compensation of postmasters alone.

Mr. STAFFORD. This item relates only to the one item of compensation of postmasters.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me that the word "hereafter" would cover all the employees who are spoken of on the next succeeding pages.

Mr. MOON. I am sure the gentleman will find that it relates only to the paragraph which deals with the compensation of postmasters, and that in the paragraphs relating to the compensation of assistant postmasters the word "hereafter" does not occur.

Mr. CANNON. Then there is no change of law from that on to all the officials who are referred to on pages 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11?

Mr. MOON. No.

Mr. CANNON. The next "hereafter" comes at the bottom of page 11, so far as I can ascertain. If the gentleman is satisfied, after examination, that the only change in law covered by the word "hereafter" applies to postmasters, I am satisfied.

Mr. MOON. I think that is the proper construction of it.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question for information?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Is the compensation of postmasters now fixed from the quarterly returns?

Mr. MOON. The compensation of postmasters is fixed from the quaterly returns.

Mr. TILSON. Does it vary from year to year, in accordance with the quarterly returns?

Mr. MOON. As I understand it, for the promotion of postmasters there must be a certain amount for four consecutive quarters, and it is now proposed that it shall be for the year instead of for the four consecutive quarters.

Mr. TILSON. But it says it shall be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster General from the respective quarterly returns.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Does that mean that if the quarterly return of the next quarter should show a larger amount, the salary would be increased accordingly?

Mr. MOON. As I understand, the law is this: In order to increase the salary there must be a fixed amount, required by the law, received for four consecutive quarters. That is, the increase must occur in each quarter. If the amount received for one quarter should be small and for the next one very large the intention is that they shall all be combined in order to fix the salary.

Mr. TILSON. But is not the salary of a first-class postmaster fixed, at so many dollars a year?

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes; in the case of first-class offices it is fixed.

Mr. TILSON. But this says first, second and third. It says—

That hereafter the respective compensation of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, graded in even hundreds of dollars and payable in quarterly payments, to be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster General from their respective quarterly returns to the Auditor for the Post Office Department, or copies or duplicates thereof to the First Assistant Postmaster General, for the calendar year immediately preceding the adjustment.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman understands that offices are ripened from a lower to a higher grade.

Mr. TILSON. I understand that; but my inquiry is as to whether this would not authorize the Postmaster General to change the salary of any postmaster of the first, second, or third class?

Mr. MOON. I do not think so at all.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman this question: The current law, carried in the bill passed March 9, 1914, contains the proviso:

Provided, That hereafter, in determining the gross receipts upon which the salary of a postmaster shall be based, stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards sold in large or unusual quantities to any person to be used in mailing matter at other post offices, or in mailing matter diverted from other offices, shall not be included, whether the sale be made with or without solicitation by the postmaster.

All that language is left out of this bill. Does that in any way change the basis of compensation?

Mr. MOON. No; it does not.

Mr. NORTON. Can the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads explain the reason for this change in the existing law?

Mr. FINLEY. If the chairman of the committee will allow me, as I understand the gentleman from North Dakota, he refers to fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. NORTON. I refer to the change in the provision for the payment of first, second, and third class postmasters, the provision beginning in line 9, page 5, and concluding with line 17, page 5, which has been read here.

Mr. FINLEY. The reason is this: At present the law, as I remember it, provides for adjusting the salaries on the 31st day of March each year at first, second, and third class post offices. I will come to the fourth-class post offices in a moment.

Mr. NORTON. This has no reference to fourth-class post offices.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand that. Now it is proposed to have the adjustment at the beginning of the calendar year, the 1st of January, and to have the salaries run from the 1st of January, being fixed then, rather than from the 31st of March, as they are fixed under existing law. It is thought that that will be in the interest of good administration; that it will be in the interest of better bookkeeping; and it will certainly do no harm or injury to the postmasters themselves to adjust the salaries at that time. The department prefers it in the interest of better administration.

Mr. NORTON. Would this provision affect a post office at a summer resort where for one quarter the mail receipts were very large and where for three quarters of the year the mail receipts were very small? Would it affect that kind of a situation?

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman necessarily speaks of a fourth-class post office.

Mr. NORTON. No; I speak of a third-class post office.

Mr. FINLEY. Before a fourth-class post office can ripen into a third-class post office it must for four consecutive quarters have receipts of a certain amount, I believe $250 for each quarter.

Mr. SISSON. One-fourth of $1,000.

Mr. FINLEY. It must equal that; so that the gentleman can see that even if the receipts for one quarter at a summer or winter resort should equal $10,000 and for the remaining three quarters, or for one quarter, the receipts did not come up to $250, that fourth-class office could not ripen into a third-class office. Now, it is proposed to cure that inequality in this way: In place of requiring the rates for four consecutive quarters at fourth-class offices to equal $250 it is proposed to have the receipts for the four quarters combined equal $1,000, and then it shall ripen into a third-class post office.

Mr. NORTON. That is one of the purposes of this provision?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; and I think it certainly should be done.

Mr. NORTON. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, line 7, after the word "masters," insert "at the rate now fixed by law."

Mr. BENNET. As to that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the point of order?

Mr. BENNET. A violation of rule 21, not in order under the Holman provision, in that it does not reduce expenditures and that it is legislation on an appropriation bill. In accordance with the prior rulings of the Chair during the day, it is subject to a point of order. It does not reduce expenditures, because the provision is that the salaries shall continue at the same rate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Replying to the point made by the gentleman from New York, I hardly think his position can be taken seriously. The provision under consideration seeks to allow the department to fix the salaries of the respective presidential postmasters on the basis of a calendar year rather than the basis at present provided by law at the expiration of the third quarter, March 31, the idea being that the department has not sufficient time in the last quarter, with the data coming in late, to fix the salaries in time for the fiscal year. In order to make the language clear that the real purpose is to only change the fixation of time when the salaries of the postmasters shall be determined, I offer the amendment, so that the present schedule of compensation shall be the same, but it will be timed on the calendar year rather than as at present on the year expiring on March 31 of each respective year.

Mr. BENNET. Earlier in the day the Chair ruled that anything that was clearly legislation and did not reduce expenditures was not in order. This clearly does not reduce expenditures, because it continues expenditures at the same rate. Without that amendment being made salaries might be reduced, so that the effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin may be to increase some salaries. It is new legislation and comes directly within the ruling the Chair made earlier in the day, in which the Chair held that any legislation which did not reduce expenditures was subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment provides that the compensation shall be at the rate now fixed by law. The Chair can not see how that changes existing law.

Mr. BENNET. Some of these salaries might be fixed at a greater amount than at present and some less.

Mr. STAFFORD. The difficulty of the gentleman's position is that no point of order has been reserved against the legislation recommended by the Post Office Committee. That stage is already passed.

Mr. BENNET. The Chair ruled earlier in the day, in sustaining a point of order, that a legislative amendment, even though it perfected legislation to which no point of order had been made, but subject to a point of order if it had been made, was not in order unless under the Holman rule it reduced expenditures. The gentleman's amendment does not reduce expenditures, but might increase them, and under the most favorable auspices would continue them, while the legislation proposed by the committee would in some instances reduce salaries, and therefore the gentleman's amendment is in violation of the spirit of the Holman rule and of Rule XXI.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair is not aware that he has made any ruling that would make this out of order. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I understand the amendment the gentleman offers would, if adopted, make the language read in this way:

Hereafter the respective compensation of postmasters, at the rate now fixed by law, of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries—

And so forth.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Does the gentleman intend to limit the Post Office Department to granting increases?

Mr. STAFFORD. These rates are fixed by law, based on receipts. This provision without the saving clause would grant, I fear, the Postmaster General authority to provide a different basis of compensation.

Mr. RUCKER. The criticism I want to make is if it would not be better to have the language read this way: "At the rate not less than now fixed by law."

Mr. STAFFORD. No; that would give the Postmaster General authority to reduce salaries. Last year the Postmaster General sought or recommended a provision seeking to cut down the salaries of postmasters. I want to carry out the purpose of this provision, and that is that he shall have the right to fix the salaries of postmasters based on the receipts of the presidential office and others for the calendar year, rather than for the year closing with the third quarter.

Mr. RUCKER. I fully sympathize with that purpose, but I am afraid it does not do it, because the language of the amendment is "rates now fixed by law," and it looks to me like a limitation on the power of the Postmaster General; it does not give any power, but it limits it.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. To what part of the paragraph does the gentleman point as changing the rates as now fixed by law?

Mr. STAFFORD. It authorizes the Postmaster General to ascertain and fix the salaries of the postmasters.

Mr. FINLEY. There is existing law stating what those rates are, and that is not included in this paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. And when we pass a subsequent enactment that changes that provision, the subsequent enactment must be taken as the last word of Congress. The law under this phraseology I contend would give the Postmaster General the right to fix the compensation of all of the postmasters of the respective presidential grades.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say this to the gentleman, that this provision covers nothing except a change of time as to the adjustment of salaries.

Mr. STAFFORD. I fully understand the ostensible purpose of it, but the phraseology goes further and bears the construction that would permit an increase or a decrease of the salaries of the postmasters as now fixed by law. I do not believe it is proper to vest that authority in the Postmaster General.

Mr. FINLEY. Nor do I; but I want to say to the gentleman that I have read this carefully, that I helped put it into the bill, and how the gentleman can make any such construction out of this paragraph I am unable to say.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are several upon this side that affirm the position that I take, and that is the reason for offering this amendment. It will clarify it and make it certain that the Postmaster General must adhere to the present rates fixed by law.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's amendment, while it will encumber the legislation, is harmless; but I do not see any reason for putting it in.

Mr. STAFFORD. Its only purpose is to clarify the ambiguity so that there will be no question that the Postmaster General will not be authorized to increase or lower the salaries of the postmasters.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. STAFFORD, and without objection the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 34, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 17, after the word "adjustment," insert the following: "And provided further, That the proviso at the end of section 252 of the Postal Laws and Regulations be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows: 'Provided, however, That this provision shall not apply to Towson, Md., or to Clayton, St. Louis County, Mo.' and that the city of Cambridge, Mass., shall be established by the Postmaster General forthwith as a separate post office of the class to which the aggregate receipts of the four substations of the Boston postal district now located within the limits of said city of Cambridge entitle it and with such substations as in his opinion the needs of said city may require."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say to the committee that the object of this amendment is to correct an injustice that was done in the Post Office appropriation bill of 20 years ago. In 1896 Congress in the Post Office appropriation bill inserted right at this same place where I have offered this amendment the following words:

Provided, That no post office established at any county seat shall be abolished or discontinued by reason of any consolidation of post offices made by the Postmaster General under existing law, and any such post office at a county seat heretofore consolidated shall be established as a separate post office at such county seat: Provided, however, That this provision shall not apply to the city of Cambridge, Mass., or to Towson, Md.

Towson, Md., is a small place near Baltimore of only two or three thousand people, and it was an advantage, of course, to have Towson made a part of the Baltimore post office. In 1912 at this same place in the Post Office appropriation bill of that year a Member of Congress from St. Louis had Clayton, in St. Louis County, Mo., included within this proviso. That is another very small place which is a part of the city of St. Louis and to which it was an advantage to be joined to a first-class post office. So that to-day, Mr. Chairman, there are only three county seats in this entire country that have not independent post offices—Towson, Md., Clayton, Mo., and Cambridge, Mass. Cambridge, Mass., is a city of over 100,000 people. It is probably somewhere between the thirtieth and the fortieth city in population in the country. It is the largest university town in the country. It is the fifth manufacturing city in Massachusetts, having over 250 manufacturing establishments with a product of over $60,000,000 a year, employing over 20,000 men and women in its industries. Yet this great city—the county seat of Middlesex County, Mass., which is larger in population than 14 different States in the Union, having over 700,000 people—is not on the post-office map of the United States. We have four substations of the Boston postal district. The Boston postal district has more substations than any other in the country—some 80 of them I am informed—and the result is that for years our postal service has been steadily getting worse. We have no one to fight our battles, we have no postmaster appointed by the President or the Postmaster General, to demand the necessary clerks and carriers to do the work. We have to take our chance as a part of the Boston post office. The Boston postmaster is always a Boston man, and he has not a particle of interest in the great city on the other side of the Charles River as a separate municipality.

I hope that no Member here will raise the point of order on this amendment, because I am offering it in the same place where the injustice was done 20 years ago, and I want to ask the Members of this House to do for my district what each one of them would want to have done for his district if this condition existed in the city from which he comes.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. I wish to say I think Cambridge, Mass., is entitled to a post office and should have one.

Mr. DALLINGER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FINLEY. And I do not think there is any serious objection to the gentleman's amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. DALLINGER. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman has made a just case for a change of the law. I believe the amendment ought to be passed, and I therefore withdraw the point of order. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, this item appropriates $31,000,000 to pay the salaries of first, second, and third class postmasters. A few years ago Congress authorized the establishment of a commission. That commission has cost the Government something like $260,000. It was an efficiency commission, commonly known as the Cleveland Commission. That commission went into the question of economy in the Postal Service, and it found that practically all the first and second class postmasters in the country could have their offices abolished without detriment to the service. In fact, they went so far as to say that the abolishment of the office of first and second class postmasters would result in an improvement in the service. We all know that many of the first and second class postmasters perform but little service aside from drawing their salaries. They receive large salaries. They are political appointments. This Cleveland Commission found that a large part of this large appropriation would be saved to the Government if its report was adopted. Following that report, President Taft, in one of his messages, recommended legislation to that effect.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. OGLESBY. Is the gentleman aware that under order issued by the present administration that condition has all been changed and these postmasters now work and earn their salaries?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. OGLESBY. It is mine.

Mr. GOOD. The same condition obtains now so far as the hearings before this committee are concerned. I do not find there has been much change in that respect. They are still, I understand, political appointments. They still draw their salaries——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The change is merely psychological, is it not?

Mr. GOOD. I think if there is any change it is only psychological.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does not the gentleman know that for 10 or 12 years past postmasters to be appointed were required to sign a written agreement or to promise they would give their official attention to the duties of the office?

Mr. GOOD. That was the case when the Cleveland commission made its investigation and report.

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I think that was put in vogue during Roosevelt's time.

Mr. GOOD. The Cleveland commission came into existence during Roosevelt's administration.

Mr. STEENERSON. I thought the gentleman meant President Cleveland.

Mr. GOOD. No; the Cleveland efficiency commission.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I do.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman is aware of the fact that postmasters for the last 8 or 10 years have had to sign a statement at the end of the fiscal year that they had given at least eight hours of their time a day to the service.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; and God pity many of the postmasters who have been signing that statement, because not one in fifty is telling the truth when he makes that statement. We all know they do not all give eight hours a day of their time exclusively to the service.

Mr. WHEELER. That may be true in the gentleman's country, but not with us.

Mr. GOOD. From the report of the Cleveland Commission, I think it is true and so recognized——

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I do.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say I can not sit by and hear this statement which the gentleman has just made——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yielded for a question, not a speech. I only have five minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. When the gentleman says not one out of fifty in the country, does the gentleman speak with reference to his own district or with general reference to the country?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman ought to state the facts——

Mr. GOOD. I have looked through these hearings to find some good reason why the report of this commission is not challenged. I, of course, do not know what takes place in the district of the gentleman from Missouri. I do not know what takes place——

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman let me tell him?

Mr. GOOD (continuing). I know this: That the Cleveland Commission, which went into this subject, for which the Congress paid $260,000, said that condition did go into this situation fully throughout the entire country, and present a strong showing, and here this committee brings in a bill reporting out year after year over $30,000,000 to pay salaries, a large part of which this impartial commission says is a mere gratuity. I do not know which is right, Mr. Chairman, but I do know that when we pay that much money for the work of a commission the country and the Congress is entitled to know whether they have been honest with Congress and made a faithful report of actual conditions existing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] was occupying the floor a moment ago, I tried courteously to ask him a question to see if I could not induce him to change the very reckless statement made by him. The gentleman, evidently realizing that his statement was so broad gauged and assailed the character of so many gentlemen throughout the country, with somewhat the appearance of peevishness refused to allow me to ask him a question. I want to challenge now his statement as I heard it. He said, "God pity the postmasters; not one out of fifty comply with the law" or with the solemn promises they made to comply with the law or the solemn declaration they make that they have complied with the law. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say I am not, and I thank God I am not, as partisan as some gentlemen whom I know.

In the district I have the honor to represent there are yet Republican postmasters serving the people, and I say for them, as well as for the others, who are Democratic, that those gentlemen do comply with the law. And I will not allow even my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] to assail those Republican or Democratic postmasters in my district without coming to their defense. The statement is wholly unworthy of the gentleman.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will be more courteous to the gentleman than he was to me.

Mr. GOOD. I was willing to yield to the gentleman for a question but not for a speech. What I wanted to ask the gentleman was: If I am not fully warranted in making the statement I do, from the report of the Cleveland commission, upon which I base my statement?

Mr. RUCKER. No; and the gentleman knows he is not, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman sometimes devotes more thought and gives more emphasis to partisanship than he does to real patriotism.

Mr. GOOD. The Cleveland commission report was made on Republican post offices and not Democratic post offices.

Mr. RUCKER. Made when?

Mr. GOOD. The report of the Cleveland commission was made, as I recall it, about 1910.

Mr. RUCKER. But the gentleman's speech a while ago related to what takes place in 1915 and 1916, not in 1910, or years ago; and I believe that progress has been made along these lines. I believe that universally postmasters are giving better attention and more efficient service than they did many years ago.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like to say a couple of words on my own account.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. RUCKER. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is withdrawn, and, without objection, the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is withdrawn, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, may I have just a moment, in order that we may have an agreement when debate on this question shall end?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. I move that it end after the gentleman has been heard.

Mr. OGLESBY. I would like to have two minutes.

Mr. MOON. Suppose the gentleman does that under another subject?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the gentleman from Iowa in the position he takes of this Cleveland commission has been misinformed. My observation in this field has been quite extensive. I have served on this committee now for nearly 12 years, and wherever I have gone through my district or through the State or wherever I travel I have made it a business to inquire into the postal matters, and I have talked with a great many postmasters and assistant postmasters, both Democrat and Republican, and I believe as a rule they are efficient and faithful public officers; that this wholesale charge that they are not doing any work, that they are drawing their salaries without giving personal attention to their duties, is an unfounded charge to a very large extent. Of course, there have been a few cases, but as a rule they are faithful servants and earn every dollar of salary that we pay them. I am sorry that the gentleman has relied upon this Cleveland commission, which nobody has heard of now for several years.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield? I not only relied upon that but upon the annual message of President Taft in noting the work of the Cleveland commission when asking Congress to enact laws to correct this evil.

Mr. STEENERSON. I never heard that the Cleveland commission had criticized all postmasters.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. FINLEY. Is it not a fact that the work, generally speaking, of the Clevelnad commission was of such ancient and fossilized character and utterly worthless that Congress refused to appropriate money for it finally and abolished it?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; and I think they did right. It was called an economy commission, but all they did was to eat up the taxes. So far as making charges against the postmasters of the country is concerned, I believe it is utterly unfounded.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, all pro forma amendments are withdrawn to the paragraph, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post offices, five, at not exceeding $4,000 each; 42, at not exceeding $3,000 each; 10, at not exceeding $2,500 each; 5, at not exceeding $2,000 each; 16, at not exceeding $1,900 each; 45, at not exceeding $1,800 each; 95, at not exceeding $1,700 each; 150, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 180, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 150, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 350, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 560, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 525, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 300, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 130, at not exceeding $900 each; 100, at not exceeding $800 each; in all, $3,200,000. And the appointment and assignment of assistant postmasters hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 10, after the word "sum," insert the words: "Provided, That hereafter the assistant postmasters in first and second class post offices shall be appointed by the postmasters, regardless of any civil-service law or regulation to the contrary."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I admit that the point of order is well taken, but I wish the gentleman would withdraw it, because these assistant postmasters occupy a very confidential relation to the postmasters, and I think they ought to be permitted to appoint their assistants. Of course the point of order is well taken, but I hope the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. MOON. I fully agree with the gentleman from Florida, but I must protect this bill with points of order in order to protect the will of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant superintendents of mails, cashiers, superintendents of delivery, and superintendents of mails, 30, at not exceeding $2,600 each.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota reserves a point of order.

Mr. NORTON. What is the necessity for the additional number there?

Mr. FINLEY. It is for the good of the service. The service requires it.

Mr. NORTON. You increase the number there by 10?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes. The good of the service requires it. There is an increase of mail every year.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota withdraws his reservation of the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, special clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, foremen of crews, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 1,560, at not exceeding $1,400 each.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is the item where provision is made for the promotion of the high-class distributing clerks in the respective post offices, designated as special clerks, to $1,400 each. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee, Are we reading the item at the bottom of page 9; as it is the item that contains the designation of special clerks, at $1,400 each?

Mr. FINLEY. No. That is on page 11.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will not interrupt me, I see the designation on line 20, page 9, "special clerks."

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, well, if the gentleman does not want to know, all right.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know whereof I am speaking. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee as to the number of clerks now in this grade, and as to how many are provided of these special clerks for promotion to the $1,400 grade?

Mr. MOON. The gentleman will have to wait for a moment until we can look at the record. The Clerk says 1,260.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is what the bill two years ago carried. That does not necessarily signify that there are not more than that number to-day, because, under the law, the Postmaster General had the authority to employ more than that number of that grade. Was any inquiry made at the hearings as to the number of special clerks that are now paid $1,400?

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman want to know the number of special clerks?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MOON. I will turn the gentleman over to my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who will inform him.

Mr. MADDEN. My understanding is that in addition to the number already existing—and I do not remember the exact number—there will be 900 additional promotions by reason of the provision of the bill on page 11.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman means 900 promotions altogether in the grades above $1,200?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can not give me the information as to how many of these high-grade clerks will be promoted from $1,300 to the $1,400 grade?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I can not give that information.

Mr. ROUSE. There are now 1,260, and this provision will pay 1,575.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill carries 1,560.

Mr. ROUSE. If this 5 per cent increase as contained in the bill on page 7 is adopted, it will be 1,575.

Mr. STAFFORD. It will provide for the promotion of how many clerks?

Mr. ROUSE. Three hundred and fifteen.

Mr. STAFFORD. Three hundred and fifteen of these special clerks now engaged in distributing work?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw my pro forma amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, foremen of crews, special clerks, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 2,800, at not exceeding $1,300 each.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE] give the number of special clerks in the $1,200 grade that will be promoted to $1,300?

Mr. ROUSE. One thousand.

Mr. STAFFORD. One thousand of the $1,200 grade will be given promotion to the $1,300 grade?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said there would be 1,000 clerks provided with promotions from $1,200 to $1,300, as I understood him. Is that correct?

Mr. ROUSE. At present there are 18,000 clerks who are drawing $1,200, and under this bill there will be 19,000 to draw $1,200.

Mr. MANN. Where do you get the proposition that there will be 19,000 at $1,200?

Mr. ROUSE. That is in the estimates.

Mr. MANN. But the bill authorizes 18,000.

Mr. ROUSE. Yes; the bill authorizes 18,000.

Mr. MANN. The estimate has nothing to do with it that I know of.

Mr. ROUSE. If the 5 per cent increase is adopted, with this it would amount to 1,000 additional clerks of that grade.

Mr. MANN. There are now authorized 18,000 clerks at $1,200. How many clerks are there actually at that salary?

Mr. ROUSE. Eighteen thousand.

Mr. MANN. Is that the statement of the department?

Mr. ROUSE. That is the statement of the department.

Mr. MANN. If that is the statement of the department, that the authorization is full up to the limit, of course that is incorrect. That never happens; but it may be very close to accurate.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And to provide for the promotion of 75 per cent of the clerks in first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade, and for the promotion of 5 per cent of the clerks in the sixth grade to the designation of "special clerk" in the $1,300 grade, and for the promotion of 5 per cent of the designated "special clerks" in the $1,300 grade to the designation of "special clerk" in the $1,400 grade, and to provide for the promotion of 75 per cent of the clerks in second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade, and for the promotion of 5 per cent of the clerks in second-class offices from the fifth to the sixth grade: And provided further, That there may also be employed at first-class post offices foremen and stenographers at a salary of $1,300 or more per annum.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky reserves the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. NORTON. What is the purpose of the proviso, Mr. Chairman, that there may also be employed at first-class post offices foremen and stenographers at a salary of $1,300 or more per annum?

Mr. MADDEN. In every first-class office in the United States they have a certain number of men employed at $1,300, and the number employed at this salary depends entirely upon the receipts. But according to this proviso every first-class office would have the right to employ at least one $1,300 clerk or stenographer or foreman. If the receipts are large enough, the number may be increased at the rate of, say, one for every additional $100,000 of receipts. If there were $200,000 additional receipts, they would get two men of this class. If the receipts were $300,000, they would get three men of this class. It depends altogether on the amount of the receipts of the office.

Mr. NORTON. According to the last part of the provision the postmaster would be permitted to pay them more than $1,300.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; the number depending on the receipts. For example, where the office was entitled to one $1,300 man, the receipts might be large enough to entitle the office to one $1,400 man. If the receipts were larger, that office might be entitled to two additional men, one at $1,400 and the other at $1,500. If the receipts were still larger, the office might be entitled to three men at $1,300, two at $1,400, and one at $1,500. If the receipts were still larger, it would increase the number of $1,300 men and also increase the number of the other grades. There might be one man at $1,600, depending entirely upon the receipts of the office.

Mr. NORTON. The number of additional clerks to which an office would be entitled would depend upon the increase in the receipts.

Mr. MADDEN. It always has.

Mr. NORTON. Say the receipts were increased $300,000 per annum, what additional clerical force would the office be then entitled to?

Mr. MADDEN. Then that office would be entitled to three additional $1,300 men, and perhaps two $1,400 men, and perhaps one $1,500 man. I am not saying offhand, now, exactly what the number would be, but I think that is pretty close to it.

Mr. NORTON. You say under existing law they would be entitled to that? Why, then, is this provision necessary?

Mr. MADDEN. They were not classed as foremen or stenographers before, and this permits them to be used as stenographers. In many first-class offices they are not entitled to use stenographers; but for the expedition of the business of the office it has been decided that it is much more advantageous to have a stenographer than it would be to have the postmaster or somebody else do the work by hand.

Mr. NORTON. How are these additional employees classed under the existing law?

Mr. MADDEN. They never had the stenographers before.

Mr. NORTON. What additional assistants were permitted, what were they called, and under what classification were they?

Mr. MADDEN. They were simply clerks.

Mr. NORTON. Could they not be used as stenographers?

Mr. MADDEN. No; they could not. They had no typewriters to begin with, and they could not be used as stenographers, and if they were used as stenographers they could not get their pay.

Mr. NORTON. They could not do the work of stenographers?

Mr. MADDEN. They could not do that work and get paid for it.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman tell me that a clerk would not be permitted to do stenographic work?

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that if a clerk does the work of a stenographer, and a stenographer is not provided for in the law, he can not be paid for his work. This recommendation is intended to facilitate the transaction of the business of the Post Office Department throughout the country.

Mr. NORTON. I understand the gentleman, as far as that is concerned. The general increases of salary under almost every item are intended to promote efficiency.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no increase of salary.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman does not need to tell me that. I can read just as well as the gentleman. There is a general increase of salaries under almost every provision that we have read in the last two pages. Of course, that is for the efficiency of the service.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say that there is no increase in salaries anywhere on any page of the bill.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman can not tell me that.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not get anywhere by saying that. I am trying to be courteous.

Mr. NORTON. And so am I.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not act like it.

Mr. NORTON. There is a gradual increase——

Mr. MADDEN. I am a member of the committee, and I have gone all through these figures, and I say to the gentleman that there is no increase. That is what I say.

Mr. NORTON. That does not make it a fact.

Mr. TILSON. I should like to ask the gentleman if all these salaries are already enacted into law?

Mr. MADDEN. All the salaries are based on the income of the offices, and have been, and will still continue to be.

Mr. TILSON. And is it not a fact that at first-class offices they already have stenographers?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; of course, at some of them.

Mr. TILSON. But they simply took clerks?

Mr. MADDEN. At some places they had stenographers, and at some not. Where a first-class office was small, it did not have a stenographer.

Mr. NORTON. I make a point of order against the last proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota makes a point of order against the proviso.

Mr. NORTON. The proviso in lines 21, 22, and 23, on page 11, which reads as follows:

And provided further, That there may also be employed at first-class post offices foremen and stenographers at a salary of $1,300 or more per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. NORTON. That it is new legislation.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order while I make some explanation?

Mr. NORTON. I should be glad to do so.

Mr. STEENERSON. I understand that there are many clerks who have to perform the duties of stenographers who have only drawn $1,200. They are clerks in the $1,200 grade, but they ought to be compensated because of the efficiency they possess as stenographers. This will enable the department to have the clerk paid as a stenographer instead of $1,200 as a clerk. It seems to me that a clerk who is able to acquire the additional ability of a stenographer ought to be compensated for it for he saves the time of officials and renders valuable services. I do not think the gentleman ought to insist on the point of order.

Mr. NORTON. Does this proviso permit the payment of more than $1,300 a year to the stenographer?

Mr. STEENERSON. I presume it would entitle them to pay more; that is what it says, but that does not necessarily mean that you are increasing the expenditures because you could take a clerk or employee that was already drawing $1,300, $1,400, or $1,500 and have him serve as a stenographer, whereas he might be a supervisory employee, and you could take a clerk at $1,200 that had no ability as a supervisory clerk.

Mr. NORTON. This provision does not increase the number of employees.

Mr. STEENERSON. No; and I do not think it will increase the expenditures. On the contrary, I think it will be an economy.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to printers, 10 at not exceeding $1,500 each; to printers, mechanics, and skilled laborers, 12 at $1,200 each, 4 at $1,100 each; 3 at $1,000 each, and 28 at $900 each; in all $62,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve a point of order to the paragraph just read, beginning with line 3 and ending with line 6, on page 12.

Mr. MOON. I thought we had passed that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was on my feet ready to make the point of order. I would like to inquire the reason why the committee has increased the salary of 10 printers from $1,200 to $1,500.

Mr. MOON. Because the committee thought they were worth it.

Mr. STAFFORD. What offices in the country would this apply to?

Mr. MOON. To the large offices.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the department make any such recommendation?

Mr. MOON. The department did not, but it was the unanimous opinion of the committee that these men ought to have more pay in the large cities like Chicago, Boston, New York, and perhaps Milwaukee. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think it is a serious proposition to have a clerk who is daily occupied continually for eight hours in a day, receiving a maximum compensation of $1,200, and have a printer by his side only performing a small portion of work during the day and receiving $300 additional, and I make the point of order.

Mr. MOON. I would suggest to the gentleman that these are foremen, and that this applies only to the large cities in which it costs a good deal to live. I believe it is right to increase it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, investigations of the employment of printers throughout the United States shows that the salaries paid are much higher than those fixed in the bill for printers in the Post Office Department. There is not a printer employed anywhere in the United States in any large printing office that does not get more than $1,500, and the investigation showed that these men, beyond any question, are working for a sum $300 below any salary paid in a private service. After that showing was made it was concluded by the committee that the Government ought to come within gunshot of paying as high a compensation for like work as is paid by a private enterprise. Hence the increase of this compensation of 10 men from $1,200 to $1,500.

Now, I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the mere fact that men are employed side by side with clerks ought not to justify the point of order; not that the gentleman has not the right to make it, but I really believe that justice would not be done in this case if a point of order were made, because it is evident to everybody who has looked carefully into this question that these men are being paid less for the same work than like men are being paid for like work by private interests. So I do not believe that the mere fact of their working side by side with clerks who only get $1,200 would justify the clerk in feeling aggrieved because of that.

There has been no change in the compensation paid by the Government of the United States to these printers employed in the Post Office for the past 25 years. Everybody knows that the standard of wages has largely increased in the last 25 years for mechanics and artisans. The committee saw no reason why they should not, in a sense, be brought up to the standard paid anywhere else. The pay in most of the great cities in the print shops is from $1,600 to $1,700 a year for a seven-and-a-half-hour day.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This is a subject upon which I am not very familiar, but I supposed that these printers were paid so much for composition.

Mr. MADDEN. Not at all; but even if they are, the average pay in private establishments credited in the cases where they are paid for composition averages up to $1,600 or $1,700 a year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman say that in private establishments they work more hours than they do for the Government?

Mr. MADDEN. They work seven and a half hours in private establishments and eight hours in the Post Office Department.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], that so far as large cities are concerned, the gentleman is correct—the compositors are paid so much per em for composition, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is entirely correct in saying that their annual yearly compensation runs between $1,600 and $1,700. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not make the point of order. This is what is known as the union rate, and if the gentleman makes the point of order he will compel the Government of the United States to employ the poorer among the printers in the future.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat acquainted with the salary of printers employed by the Government in our various departments here, and in many instances, as will be seen by a study of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, the salaries are eleven hundred dollars and twelve hundred dollars per year. These men employed in this branch of the service are not pressed continuously with work, because their work is only of a certain minor character for a portion of each day. It is not of the highest character, so far as the composition is concerned. It is well known that the composition in many of these establishments is obtained on the outside. I know of no instance where, in this bill or any other bill, there has been such a marked increase in salary as from $1,200 to $1,500. Therefore, I make the point of order to that part of the phraseology after the word "compensation," in line 3, down to the semicolon, in line 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order to the words "to printers, 10, at not exceeding $1,500 each." The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois on the point of order, if he desires.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no desire to argue the point of order. I have no doubt that the point of order is well taken, but we will have to offer an amendment to the bill to conform to the original law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by increasing the number from 12 to 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 5, strike out the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-two."

Mr. MADDEN. That would make the number conform to the original law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing to support the amendment because I take the judgment of the committee, and have no knowledge on the subject whatever except that now they have 10 printers. Last year the bill that we passed in the House provided for 10 printers, and the law of two years ago, under which they are operating, provides for 10 printers. We have recently had reported into the House a bill from the Committee on Printing which, if it passes the Congress, will do away with all of these printers, as I understand. The Post Office Department is very much opposed to turning all of the public printing over to the Printing Office, in so far as it involves the Post Office Department, and I think with a great deal of justice. The printing bill, so the Post Office Department says, would completely abolish any printing by the Post Office Department, and I would not be at all surprised if we will be in the position of passing a bill increasing the number of printers in the Post Office Department by more than 100 per cent and then in a few days passing the printing bill, which will entirely abolish their use—which would be characteristic of Democratic legislation..

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to watchmen, messengers, and laborers, 1,800, at $840 each; in all, $1,400,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order is well taken, because we have increased the wages of 940 laboring men from $720 a year to $840 a year, giving them the same amount that 900 other laborers in the United States employ get in similar work.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. The department asks that you increase the salaries of 900 to $840 and leave the other 900 at the present salary fixed by law, $720.

Mr. MOON. I do not care what the department asks. This is what the committee has done.

Mr. SISSON. I mean that the law before was $720 for 1,800 laborers.

Mr. MOON. No; it was not. The law before was $720 for 900 laborers and $840 for 900 more laborers, and the committee thought that they should all receive the same pay for doing the same work, and we put it at 1,800 at $840 each.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman wants to discuss the point of order, very well, but this is entirely outside of it.

Mr. MOON. Oh, the gentleman called out what I said by his own inquiry. The point of order is well taken. We will have a rule to put this back.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the paragraph is subject to the point of order. It is in order to provide for watchmen, messengers, and laborers at a salary of $840 each. That is the provision in the current law, and under the amendment that was adopted here a year or two ago, it would be in order now if it were not in order in any other way, but it has been repeatedly held by the Chair, as to the Post Office Department, that these are necessary employees for the department, and it is proper to make provision for them. The Chair will notice all through the Post Office appropriation bill every year the number of employees at fixed salaries varies from year to year, and is never the same. All the clerks, the supervisory officials, the superintendents, the cashiers—all these employees vary from year to year, and it has been repeatedly held by the chairman on construction of the Post Office appropriation bill that the increase in the number of employees at a certain salary is in order and not subject to the point of order. Let us see what this committee has done in making this recommendation. They have raised the number of these employees from 900, under existing law or under the bill of last year, to 1,800, at $840 each. That is a mere change in the number; that is not a change in the salary, and it is in order now, if it be desired to move to make the number 2,800. This is not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the existing law. The last bill that carried this item carried it for compensation to watchmen, messengers, and laborers, 900 at $840 each, and 900 at $720 each. That makes 1,800 in all. This paragraph provides for compensation of 1,800 messengers and laborers at $840 each, thereby raising the compensation of 900.

Mr. MANN. That is a mere supposition of the Chair as to whether it raises somebody's salary.

The CHAIRMAN. But the existing law provides for 900 at $720.

Mr. MANN. The items have to be considered by themselves. As I stated before, there have been repeated rulings upon it. The number of employees at fixed salaries changes from year to year; it is never the same one year; and it is all through the bill, and could not be because the Post Office Department grows, and the Chair has always so held and there have been repeated rulings upon it. For instance, on page 9, lines 5 to 15, for various salaried officers, the current law provides for 600, whereas this provides for 900, and it is not subject to the point of order, and there have been repeated rulings upon that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The position of the gentleman is that 900 of these employees have been dropped.

Mr. MANN. The committee has left out 900——

The CHAIRMAN. And the number of the others has been increased to 1,800.

Mr. MANN. Certainly. That is the case with all of these clerks. Here a few years ago the number of employees at $1,000 was very large, and the committee brought in a recommendation making the number at $1,100 very much larger and dropped a corresponding number at $1,000, and the same was true of other classes lower down. That is done every year, and it has been repeatedly held in order because it being in order to fix the number of clerks for the Postal Service the committee has authority to increase the number from year to year, and what the effect may be is not for the Chair to rule upon, because the question is, Is the item in order on its face? The mere fact that something is left out of last year's bill has nothing to do with it at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to be heard?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say there is no authorization for an increase of these messengers from $720 to $840. You can not find a statute where they are authorized, either in a general statute or where they are authorized by special statute, to pay but $720 except in the last year's appropriation bill.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. That does not seem to be the question. The question is, Can we increase the number of $800 men; that is the question. Can we increase that number?

Mr. SISSON. My contention is that you can not do that because the salary of these messengers is fixed at $720 by law.

Mr. TILSON. We can leave them out, can we not?

Mr. SISSON. If you do the $840 would be subject to the point of order. The salary fixed by law some years ago for messengers was $720.

Mr. TILSON. Can not we increase the number of $840 messengers?

Mr. SISSON. You can not until you shall have created the places, and if in the past the $800 men hereafter shall be paid that amount of money and you fix the number at 900, you can not increase the number because the salary is fixed by law at $720, and unless you write 900 or 1,000 or 2,000, $720 places in the $840 places, you can not get the proportion that the committee asks.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the gentleman from Mississippi contend the law now limits the number of this class of employees?

Mr. SISSON. I do not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. For which a salary of $840 a year is provided?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What law limits the number?

Mr. SISSON. The salary fixed by law for messengers and that class of laborers is $720. The appropriation bill puts in 900 at $840, which limits the number to 900——

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does that limit the number that may draw $840?

Mr. SISSON. It does, indeed, for the reason that, my own judgment is, that the $840 ought to go out; but the department asks for 900 at $720 and 900 at $840, and that I am willing to give——

Mr. CAMPBELL. Of course, the department does not——

Mr. SISSON (continuing). I am absolutely sure that we ought to permit the department to say that the $720 men are ample. It does seem to me, in these appropriation bills, that some little consideration might be given to the taxpayers—the men who pay the bills. I can not understand why, when the department asks for 900 $720 men, that we should force on them this increased salary.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. They never have any trouble in getting all the men they need. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TILSON. That may be an excellent argument so far as the merits of the case are concerned; but the question now really is whether under the rules we are permitted to increase the number of $840 men.

Mr. SISSON. I was simply replying to my friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and I had no idea of making any statement of that kind except in reply to his inquiry.

Now, the gentleman will be unable to find any law that will authorize the men at $720 to be raised to $840. And, except the raise was made, in my recollection, in the last bill, they will not find any authority to increase a single one from $720 to $840. Now, if you do this, you create a situation where all the other departments of the Government will be called upon in the interest of the men in the service to be raised to $840. Not only that, but you are going to have this condition of affairs, that a laborer entering a department will get $40 more than the clerk entering the department—a man who has not the ability of a clerk.

Mr. GORDON. You think it will cause a horizontal raise, do you?

Mr. SISSON. It always has in the past, and I judge it will in the future. They will say in the departments, "They increased the chief clerk's salary, the laborer's salary, in such and such a department, and why should not my department do the same thing?" and all the teeming thousands will want the same thing. Now, Mr. Chairman, I state that there is no authority of law for employing these messengers, and these gentlemen will not find it, at more than $720 as the entrance salary into this service.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Does the gentleman from Iowa wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TOWNER. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman.

I think it must be clear to everyone if the paragraph should remain as it was last year, and the number of laborers had been increased from 900 to 1,000 at $840 each, and the number had been increased in the next item of 900 at $720 each, that would have been in order. Now, because the number at $720 has been dropped entirely it does not certainly take away the right to increase, however much may be necessary, the number at $840. In other words, there is no objection under the rule for dropping entirely the number that was paid at $720 each, because, Mr. Chairman, there is no change in the classification. The contention of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] would be correct if there was a difference in classification between those that were paid $840 and those that were paid $720. But there is no difference in classification. They are all watchmen, messengers, and laborers, and as it would be perfectly proper to increase the number in the first instance or the number in the second instance, so is it perfectly proper to increase the number in the first instance and to drop out entirely the second classification.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The item carried in last year's appropriation bill provided for the payment of 1,800 watchmen, messengers, and laborers, 900 of them to receive $840 and 900 to receive $720 each. The item we are considering provides for the payment of $840 each to 1,800 watchmen, messengers, and laborers. Section 169 of the Revised Statutes provides that:

> Each head of a department is authorized to employ in his department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

Now, if this item remains in the bill, Congress will appropriate this year for 1,800 watchmen, messengers, and laborers at the rate of $840 each per year if the head of this department desires to employ that many at that compensation. This matter has been considered in the House before. It came up on March 27, 1906, upon the proper construction of the law authorizing the employment of watchmen, laborers, and other employees in the executive departments. I have just read the statute.

On March 23, 1906, the legislative appropriation bill was being considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] made the point of order that there was no law to authorize a proposed appropriation for "one telephone-switchboard operator in the Department of State." At that time the chairman, Mr. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, said:

This is an appropriation for a telephone-switchboard operator in the Department of State, which is an executive department.

Then, after quoting the section of the Revised Statutes I have read, he proceeded as follows:

The telephone-switchboard operator may fairly be classed as a sort of laborer, skilled laborer, within the spirit and intendment of the statute.

The Chair is of opinion that this case is covered and the appropriation authorized by section 169 and overrules the point of order.

The Chair thinks that section 169 of the Revised Statutes applies here, and under section 169 of the Revised Statutes, if this section is enacted into law, the Postmaster General would be authorized by law to employ these 1,800 clerks at $840 each, or as many of them as may be needed. The law clearly provides that he can employ them—messengers, watchmen, and laborers—at the compensation fixed each year by Congress.

The point of order is overruled.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is recognized.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a motion to amend the section so that it shall read:

For compensation to watchmen, messengers, and laborers, 900 at $840 each and 900 at $720 each; in all, $1,404,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph of the bill, page 12, lines 7, 8, and 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For compensation to watchmen, messengers, and laborers, 900 at $840 each; 900 at $720 each; in all, $1,404,000."

Mr. SISSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is what the department has estimated and asked for—900 laborers at $840 and 900 at $720.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is there an error in the bill?

Mr. SISSON. In this bill?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. The department says the committee will have to increase the item to $1,475,000 if the item is carried as it is now.

Mr. MANN. That is, if they are all employed at one time?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; if they are all employed. In other words, that much will be needed to carry out the new law.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Mississippi understands that in no place of this bill would you get the figures at the end of the paragraph by multiplying the number of persons employed by the salary.

Mr. SISSON. I have not done that. I have simply taken the last year's appropriation. It is in the exact language.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman proposes to increase the appropriation by a reduction of the salaries. [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. In other words, I simply take the language carried in the appropriation bill which was passed two years ago.

Mr. MANN. Would not the gentleman rather give these men $840 and save the Government $4,000 than pay them $720 a year and increase the governmental expenses by $4,000?

Mr. SISSON. But the trouble will be that when this bill gets to the other end of the Capitol the House will have forced upon the department what it has not asked for, and you will be compelled, as the chief clerk estimated, to make the appropriation $1,475,000 instead of $1,400,000.

Mr. MANN. Well, as to being compelled to do something by the other end of the Capitol, that is a question.

Mr. SISSON. I presume the department knows what it is doing.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this to the committee as a matter of information: While the committee provides for 1,800 men, the Post Office Department does not always need that number of men, any more than they need the exact number of clerks provided for. To-day they are employing only 1,600 men, and $1,400,000 is sufficient to pay the number of men to be employed. But the provision in the bill would enable them in an emergency to employ 1,800 men.

Mr. SISSON. If they do, you will have to appropriate $1,475,000.

Mr. MADDEN. If you needed the 1,800 men all the time, you would need $1,512,000.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the gentleman's amendment. He is attempting to increase the appropriation by $4,000.

Mr. MADDEN. One million four hundred thousand dollars is all that will be needed to employ the number of men required. They will not employ the men unless they require them. There is no use in appropriating more, unless they know they will want it.

Mr. SISSON. They could create a deficiency.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the subcommittee of the committee on which the gentleman serves.

Mr. SISSON. I know; and I do not want you to put that job on me by cutting the appropriation down and increasing the amount that must be appropriated as a deficiency.

Mr. ROUSE. At the end of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915, there was an unexpended balance of $154,000 in this appropriation.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I have that information.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have nothing further to say, except that I hope Congress will not be put in the attitude of enlarging the estimates of the department.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the gentleman's amendment. It increases the appropriation provided by this bill by $4,000.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the bill that is now current law there were 900 of these watchmen, messengers, and laborers at $840, and 900 at $720. If all those were employed the total would be just what the gentleman from Mississippi has proposed, namely, $1,404,000. Now, does it ever happen, as a matter of fact, that all the men appropriated for are actually employed? Are you really not appropriating more than there is any probability of being used?

Mr. SISSON. In the doctrine of probabilities that is absolutely true. That might happen; but in fixing the salaries and the number of men it has been the rule to give the department enough money to provide for the salaries of the men. Otherwise you necessarily have to create a deficiency, and that, of course, ought to be avoided if you can possibly do so, because in many instances they are not able to tell just how many men they are going to employ and how many men they are going to have. But in this case you fix the number that you can employ, and you have fixed their salaries, and you ought to appropriate enough. If it is not needed it goes back to the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York make his point of order?

Mr. OGLESBY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is not well taken. The point of order is overruled. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks in charge of contract stations, $1,160,000: Provided, That hereafter the Postmaster General may enter into contracts for the conduct of such stations for a term not exceeding four years.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

First, I should like to make inquiry about the amount of the appropriation. In the law two years ago the amount was $1,200,000. The bill last year as it passed the House carried $1,200,000, but the committee now make it $1,160,000, which is $40,000 less than the committee agreed to last year.

Mr. MADDEN. I asked the First Assistant Postmaster General, when he was before the committee, whether he did not believe $1,250,000 could be very properly employed in this service, and whether he did not think it would add to the revenue of the department without any increase whatever in the expense, and he admitted that it would; but he said he thought he would be able to accommodate all the necessities of the case in every section of the country with an appropriation of $1,160,000, and was not willing to recommend the increased amount suggested by my query.

Mr. MANN. I have always found that the gentlemen up there at the department, especially those who are there now, are very courteous in matters of this sort. I have very little to do with the Post Office Department, but there are a lot of these contract stations in my district, which is, of course, a part of the postal district of the city of Chicago. There are places in my district now, quite thickly settled, where it is impossible to buy a postage stamp within reasonable walking distance. The postmaster in Chicago says he is not authorized to add any contract stations. It is possible that if I should go to the Post Office Department and solicit them as a favor, in view of the position that I occupy, they might treat me leniently, but I do not desire to do that. We in the large cities have to depend very largely on these contract stations for that part of our Postal Service which relates to the sending out of mail matter. A large number of you gentlemen here get rural routes, which we gladly help to pay for; but when it comes to facilities for the purchase of postage stamps and the sending out of parcels, as a rule the department and the Post Office Committee do not see the necessity of them as much as we do who feel the need.

Mr. MADDEN. I may say, for the information of my colleague, that at the end of the last fiscal year there was in this fund an unexpended balance of $53,000, and they could have established a number of stations which were not established, if they had thought proper to do so.

Mr. MANN. My colleague understands very well—better than most Members of the House, and many of them do not understand it—that it is very seldom an appropriation is completely exhausted. No branch of the public service, as a rule, is warranted in going up to the extreme limit of the appropriation. They always have some reserve, and I apprehend that there is not a single item in this bill where the expenditure equals the appropriation. So the fact that there was something left at the end of the year does not make any difference. We did not get the service. I do not criticize the department for holding that reserve.

Mr. MOON. Has the gentleman from Illinois before him the explanation of the department with reference to this?

Mr. MANN. I have not the explanation of the department before me, but I have talked with the department in reference to the matter.

Mr. MOON. It is very brief. I will read it to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I shall be very glad to have the gentleman do that.

Mr. MOON. They say:

The expenditures under this item increased 7.28 per cent in 1914 and 14.12 per cent in 1915, while the increase sought for 1917 is only 5.45 per cent.

They say further:

If the contract period for these stations is extended to four years as recommended, it is believed that an annual saving of about $75,000 will be effected, and that much better service to the public will be secured.

Mr. MANN. That may be correct, but as a rule it does not make any difference whether the contract is for four years or not. The stations are not changed. Stations in Chicago remain where they are as long as the man will keep them. As a rule when they are changed it is because the druggist—and the agent is usually a druggist—refuses to keep it any longer, for the reason that the salary is not sufficient.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. Can you get a better contract by a long or a short term?

Mr. MANN. I do not think it makes much difference. It is possible that you might get a better contract for a longer term, but the department will retain the power in any event to dismiss the man, and he will retain the right to quit if he wants to. The contract now amounts to nothing, as far as the contract is concerned. The department starts these stations in at $50 to $100 a year, and they sometimes raise it to $100 or $200 if the business warrants it. I think there are one or two stations where they pay as high as $1,000, where it takes several clerks to do the business. It is the cheapest work that the Government gets. That I do not complain of. I think it is for the interest of the Government in thickly residential communities to furnish sufficient means for the purchase of postage stamps, so that those who want to write letters for first-class mail may buy them without walking their feet off.

I have a district somewhat scattered and somewhat suburban, with thickly settled localities in it. A few years ago I had a locality in my district which had a population of 10,000, and the Post Office Department had not provided any place where one could buy a postage stamp. Of course I got that corrected. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I renew the reservation of the point of order. No branch of the Postal Service is being so hampered by restrictions on account of appropriations as this very deserving service, as explained by the gentleman from Illinois. The amount of the appropriation has not been increased commensurately with the increased needs of the service. The way the department has met that condition is by requiring a greater amount of work to be performed by the respective storekeepers who have contracts. For years past we have been increasing the work of all of these contract stations, especially since the parcel post was established. There is to my knowledge and to the knowledge of many men here who are acquainted with the work of these contract stations, that during the Christmas period it requires the attention of one or two clerks exclusively to take charge of the mail brought to these drug-store stations. No additional compensation is allowed for that. The Government gets the benefit of the great increase in the number of postal money orders, the number of parcel-post packages, as well as the stamps required for the mail, and yet they pay these contract stations the same, and in most instances a smaller, rate of compensation. Of course, they can continue to do that, but in doing so you reduce the number of storekeepers who are willing to undertake this service. There have been many instances called to my attention where they have refused to do the work for the meager compensation of $100, $200, or $300.

The people generally want this service for their accommodation, and it is for the advantage of the Government that these stations should be located at the most favored places. Just because it brings in business a large drug store is not going to continue the service when it performs work that is worth $800 or $1,000 and receives only $100 or $200. That is the reason I am opposed to the Government entering into a contract for a four-year term. It would not be fair to the storekeeper to fix the work at an initial salary of $100 and then compel him to perform the contract for three succeeding years when the business has increased so that it is worth much more. I have no objection to providing a contract for two years, but I think all will agree that it is unfair to the storekeeper who is doing a valuable service for one-sixth or one-tenth of what he should receive to enter into a contract for four years when the growth of the service will result in his doing an increasing amount of work at the same rate of compensation. I would like to ask the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, if he will not agree to change the language so as to make it two years instead of four. That is what was carried in last year's bill. I think it only fair to the drug-store proprietors that they should not be required to restrict themselves to four years, and not take into consideration the accumulating work with the growth of the service.

Mr. MOON. I do not care whether it is two or four years; I do not think it makes very much difference. I rather think I would prefer to leave my opinion about this matter to the department, which has had some experience in the matter and thinks evidently that it can make better terms on a four years' contract than it can on two.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the question is whether it is fair to these drug-store proprietors, when they are desirous of having this work, to restrict them to four years, when their work will multiply two or three or four times within that period.

Mr. MOON. I do not think they would object. I do not think it is unfair to them. Of course, under the law this contract can be terminated at any time.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Government would have the privilege of terminating it, but not the individual drug-store keeper.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wisconsin permit me to ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Would the chairman of the committee be willing to have a contract for four years made for rural-delivery service or for postmaster service?

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman wants my serious opinion about that, if we could get a contract for rural-delivery service, I would take the chance on one for 10 years.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is quite right if he could get it. You might take the chances on one for life, but does the gentleman think there is any chance of getting it?

Mr. MOON. No; I do not.

Mr. MANN. These men are practically our rural service and postmasters both. Why should they be obliged to make a contract for four years without any regard to the increase in the amount of work they have to do, when you would not want to apply it to the rural carriers or the postmasters?

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman want to amend it by making it two years?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] that two years perhaps would be better than four, and that we ought to accept the suggestion of these gentlemen.

Mr. MOON. Very well.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order and offer the amendment to strike out "four" and insert "two."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 13, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "two."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. "O Consistency, thou art a jewel." This morning the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] saw fit to attack the postal employees of this country for exercising their right of petition to Congress in order to obtain remedial legislation. This morning I received in my mail, as I believe every Member of Congress received, the following letter, which I desire to read:

FEBRUARY 16, 1916.

Hon. DANIEL J. GRIFFIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Guardians of Liberty of New York State most respectfully request you to work for the passage of the Sisson House joint resolution No. 157, which is in exact conformity with our principles and is in force in many of the States at the present time. If Congress can establish no religion (as per the first amendment to the Constitution), is it not inconsistent for Congress to recognize and support religious institutions? We hold that it is; and therefore ask your support of the Sisson resolution.

We also ask you to use your best efforts to defeat every and any bill or resolution—that is or may come up—that has for its purpose the appropriation of public funds for sectarian Indian schools or any other sectarian institution of whatever nature it may be.

Thanking you in advance for your efforts in behalf of your constituency, we beg to remain,

Very truly, yours, GEO. W. BAEHRE,
State Guardian.

Comment, I think, is unnecessary. [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The difference between the letter written and the one to which I have called attention is that this letter happens to be a letter from a man who is not on the pay roll of the Federal Government. Nor will any gentleman say that I have any objection personally to the employees of the Government writing letters complaining about either their treatment or the inadequacy of their pay; but some gentlemen seem to think that the mere reading of the letter without comment of any character as to the gentleman who wrote it is an assault upon him. I do not say that it is, because I do not know the gentleman. He may be everything that a man ought to be, and I am not endeavoring to say that he is not or that he is. I do not know. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in securing this legislation they might take into consideration the amount of selfish pressure that is brought to bear upon Congress by people who are getting salaries out of the Government. The Congress has the right, with its strong arm, under the Constitution, to reach out and take away from the citizen his property and put it into the Treasury, and I maintain that in the expenditure of that money we ought to be a great deal more careful than when we spend our own funds. When a man expends his own funds, they are his; but every dollar that goes into the Treasury is a trust fund. I also believe that every employee of the Federal Government should get a just and fair compensation for what he does, but I am unwilling that you should segregate the employees of the Government and put them into a specially privileged class by themselves. For that reason, I have objected to that character of legislation, because my judgment is that you are coming rapidly to a civil-pension list in this country, and I am opposed to that, and I want to oppose every step in that direction, and do it with all of the energy of my soul, and I hope with fairness.

Just as certain as you go to a civil pension with these men working for the Government just so certain you must go to a pension for men unfortunate in private life in not having secured property by economy. An old-age pension for these men working in the shops, working in the factories, working in the mines and on the farms is going to come, because they will not permit this sort of legislation to be brought about.

Now, so far as the resolution which I introduced is concerned——

Mr. MANN. We will accept the gentleman's apology.

Mr. SISSON. I am not apologizing at all.

Mr. MANN. This is Saturday night.

Mr. SISSON. I am simply stating my position, not in any way in the nature of an apology. On the contrary, I was never more seriously in earnest about a matter in my life than in the statement that I am making this fight because I do not believe in this character of legislation.

Mr. MANN. I would like to suggest to my friend from Tennessee, for whom I have such high regard, that this is Saturday night.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, was a vote taken on the amendment I offered?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to withhold his motion to rise until a vote can be taken on the amendment I offered.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I will withhold the motion for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter:

FEBRUARY 18, 1916.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I respectfully ask that I be granted leave of absence for one week, beginning with February 19. Important business matters at home require my personal attention. With best wishes, I am,

Yours, very truly, EDW. COOPER.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the leave is granted.

NATIONAL SAFETY FIRST EXPOSITION.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. To ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado that he address the House for one minute. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the executive departments of the Federal Government have with a great deal of care, skill, and energy prepared a "National Safety First Exposition," showing the various activities of six of the departments of our Government in the conservation of life and property.

The departments and their various bureaus have collected and arranged a wonderfully valuable and instructive exhibit, which every Member of this House should see. This exhibit is assembled at the National Museum. The exposition will open next Monday at 2 p. m., and lasts for six days.

One of the secretaries of the departments will preside and deliver a lecture on the activities of his department each evening at 8.30 p. m. at the National Museum.

The gentleman from Illinois, Dr. FOSTER, chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, would have made this announcement if he were present, but he is absent by direction of the House, examining the flood conditions in the South, and therefore, as acting chairman of that committee, I am requested by the executive departments to extend a special invitation to all the Members of Congress to encourage the splendid efforts of the Government officials and employees in their most praiseworthy work of preserving human life and property. The departments and bureaus are scientifically and practically inaugurating a national system of safety first in all of the vast operations of our Federal Government. This is purely a governmental affair. We are, as Representatives of our country, interested in this great constructive work, and we will all be instructed and interested by attending this exposition, and it will please these departments and greatly encourage all the Government employees who are doing all this work without any extra expense to the Government if all the Members of the House will individually accept this invitation, and I hope you all will. The program is as follows:

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

The Chair desires to say that House bill 11724 is one of those bills that could be referred to either one of two committees, and it was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The title of the bill is:

For securing and establishing a uniform system of testing quality and condition of milk and cream moving in interstate shipments and intended for human food, and for other purposes.

There is more in the bill that belongs to the Agricultural Committee than to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Either one might have jurisdiction with propriety; but, without objection, it will be re-referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as this relates to pure-food matters have the chairmen of the committees examined the bill?

The SPEAKER. The chairman of one committee did.

Mr. MANN. The one that does not want it or the one that does want it?

The SPEAKER. The one that does want it.

Mr. MANN. Unless the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has been consulted, I shall temporarily have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MANN. Because that committee has jurisdiction over pure-food matters.

MONDAY, February 21, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, by Thy watchful care and the manifold ministries of Thy grace we have been preserved in peace and great prosperity. Thou hast enabled us through the generous heart of this great land to make friends of many who are in suffering and distress in this time. We pray that Thou wilt through all that comes to us out of the tragedy of our time chasten and refine and purify the heart of our Nation, making us more sensitive to human suffering, more willing to answer the call of human need, and with all that we send and do, do Thou send forth Thy world gospel that there may be reestablished in the earth the rule of peace and good will among men. Guide us in the discharge of the sacred obligations of this day. Forgive our sins. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Whereas many million dollars are annually expended in Porto Rico for intoxicating liquors, the larger part of these liquors being consumed by the people living in rural territory, who are more than two-thirds of the population; and

Whereas the consumption of these liquors is not only a drain on the earnings of the agricultural classes, but is causing the deterioration of the laborers, and the ruin of many families and homes: Therefore be it

DISTRICT COURT AT RALEIGH, N. C.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4480) providing for the establishment of two additional terms of the District Court for the Eastern District of North Carolina at Raleigh, N. C. It is a local bill, and provides for the holding of two terms of the district court at Raleigh. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that two additional terms of the district court, for the trial of civil cases, for the eastern district of North Carolina shall be held at Raleigh, N. C., on the first Monday in March and the first Monday in September.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN E. WOODS.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for a change of reference. On December 7, 1915, I introduced the bill (S. 797) for the relief of John E. Woods and it was referred to the Committee on Claims. It refers to a claim growing out of Indian Service. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Claims present, but I request that the bill be withdrawn from that committee, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Committee on Claims will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and it will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ELLIS P. GARTON.

Mr. KENYON. I ask that the bill (H. R. 7502) for the relief of Ellis P. Garton, administrator of the estate of H. B. Garton, deceased, which was referred to the Committee on Claims be withdrawn from that committee and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Depredations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Indian Depredations.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. For the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], I report back from the Committee on Pensions favorably and with amendments the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 89) to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved February 25, 1915, and I submit a report (No. 152) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. I will state that it simply corrects an error in the act and also one in the title.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 4, after the word "pensions," to insert "and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and"; so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph in the act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved February 25, 1915, private act No. 193, Sixty-third Congress, granting an increase of pension to George A. Kogle, late of Company I, One hundred and sixtieth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving, be corrected and amended to read as follows:

"The name of George A. Kogle, late of Company I, One hundred and sixteenth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution to amend an act entitled 'An act granting pensions and increase of pension to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war,' approved February 25, 1915."

The amendment of the committee to strike out the preamble was agreed to.

RELIEF OF FLOOD SUFFERERS.

Mr. BROUSSARD. From the Committee on Military Affairs, I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 101) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan, issue, or use quartermaster's and medical supplies for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and making an appropriation therefor, and I ask unanimous consent for its consideration at this time.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to loan, issue, or use such tents, provisions, and supplies pertaining to the Quartermaster and Medical Departments of the Army from any stores now on hand as he may deem necessary for the temporary relief of destitute persons in need of the same in the districts overflowed by the floods of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, under such regulations for the care and return of articles not consumed in the use as he may deem necessary, and $100,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is appropriated to carry out the purpose of the resolution, to be expended by the Secretary of War as in his discretion may be necessary.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDRESS BY J. CRAWFORD BIGGS (S. DOC. NO. 341).

WATER POWER.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask that an article from the Outlook of date February 9, 1916, which is communicated to me by way of petition, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I do not wish to have it read. It is an article by Hugh L. Cooper, engineer, on the subject of water power, and I think it is material to the bill now pending on that subject.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WATER POWER.

[By Hugh L. Cooper.]

(The author of this article is a well-known hydraulic engineer. His best-known work is the great hydroelectric plant on the Mississippi River at Keokuk, Iowa. He speaks with experience, knowledge, and authority on the subject of water power.—The Editors.)

"To gather the streams from waste and to draw from them energy, labor without brains, and so to save mankind from toil that it can be spared, is to supply what, next to intellect, is the very foundation of all our achievements and all our welfare."—From a decision handed down by Justice Holmes in the United States Supreme Court on January 24, 1916.

The strength of any nation can in a large degree be measured by the intelligence shown in the development of its natural resources. While the United States is endowed with a great natural resource in its water powers, only about 30 per cent of our water powers have been developed, and the remaining 70 per cent are lying idle, and practically no new developments have been inaugurated in the last seven years. The question arises, What is the matter? A reply would seem to comprehend some historical data, the value of these resources to the public, how to secure these values, and what results may be reasonably expected if the industry is restored to a healthy state of growth.

Water power as a provider of human necessity is an agency several thousand years of age, but more progress in its use has been made in the last 25 years than in all of the time that has gone before. Present-day industrial and economic standards have made power a public necessity, and invention, notwithstanding all its losses and failures, continues to furnish new facilities for our needs at a rate which makes intelligent realization of them an impossibility. For example, the modern use of water power has become possible only through the instrumentality of much intricate and special apparatus. One instance is the present-day hydraulic governor, which is an indispensable factor in any hydroelectric plant, though representing only about 1 per cent of its cost. Its function, as its name indicates, is to control, which it does automatically and instantly. It regulates the amount of water delivered to the water wheel to suit the various conditions imposed by the consumer. It has cost 15 years of time and around two millions of money to perfect this governor. All of the apparatus and parts constituting the remaining 99 per cent cost of a hydroelectric plant would serve for approximately similar illustration, and the scrap piles in the wake of their development and perfection are monuments to innumerable failures and losses such as are incident to the evolution of every great mechanical and industrial achievement.

Many new twentieth-century blessings might be enumerated, and the question arises, "How did they come into practical being?" By legislative fiat and Government control? No, they are the direct result of brain competitions in which the spirit of achievement and the hope for the regard of their fellows and reasonable financial reward have spurred on countless thousands of men through defeat after defeat to final success. The spirit of competition overcomes the greater part of the obstancles in human progress, thus providing most of the blessings we enjoy, and the corresponding list in the flat column is painfully small.

Water-power development in the United States is at a very low ebb, and many are asking why. The ever-rising standards of living make the demand for power greater each year. In 1850 we used three-tenths of a ton of coal per capita per annum. To-day we use twenty times as much, and most of this is for industrial power purposes. Seven hundred and fifty thousand miners produced the coal we consumed in 1913, at the rate of 760 tons per miner per annum. By the year 1940 we will probably be using 1,200,000,000 tons of coal per annum and require 1,600,000 miners. A practical economic question may well here arise, Have we the coal and what will be the probable cost of it? Statistics show that we have the coal for many years to come, but also show that the economical deposits are being worked first, and, as the coal becomes deeper, the costs increase rapidly.

Also it is realized by observing persons that the labor supply of the world is being rapidly destroyed, to what final extent no one can estimate. The best statisticians in Europe agree that when the war now raging is over at least 14,000,000 men will have been withdrawn from the world's field of labor. No one can deny that such a reduction in the supply of labor, together with the new political power the labor then remaining will possess, will create a corresponding increase in the demand for and cost of labor. This must result in a world-wide increase in the cost of coal and all other commodities.

It is unreasonable to suppose that Europe will permit itself to be further impoverished by emigration after the war has done its work, and the men left will be so badly needed at home. The tide Europeward will be stemmed only by an increase of wages in this country sufficient to keep our present foreign labor. If the foregoing is good reasoning, then are we not now in a zone of shortage of labor that will affect the coal supply and price and affect materially every other walk of life, especially agriculture and manufacturing?

The above question may well be asked. An analysis of Government statistics shows that, where we are now paying $14.20 per capita per annum for coal for our population, by 1940 we will be paying $22.60 per capita. This means a constantly increasing tax on all our people, from which they have the right to relief if relief is possible. Reliable data show that the efficiency of steam-power development has practically reached its maximum. If this is true, and the cost of coal is to go up and the needs of the people for power are constantly increasing, how can the situation be relieved? The answer is, by the development of our water power as rapidly and as fully as it can be accomplished without any sacrifice of the public interest.

Let us now, having considered the necessity for water power, see what the important facts are regarding it. The average cost of a water power per horsepower may be taken at about five times that of steam, and in addition the difficulties in raising money and the cost of money for water powers are much greater than for steam, because the steam plant is free from flood hazards in construction and operating periods and it can be constructed in small units about as the market requires, whereas the water power usually has to be greatly overdeveloped and then wait for its market to grow up to it, thus entailing large additional interest costs while securing and waiting for business. The water power requires for operation about one-fourth the amount of labor that steam power requires, therefore the water power conserves labor as well as coal.

The United States Government estimates show about 60,000,000 horsepower now undeveloped in the United States. Probably 15,000,000 of this horsepower is worth developing under present conditions. As to the value of the 15,000,000 horsepower to our people when its development is completed much can be said. The larger proportion of this undeveloped power is in the South and West, where there are room and need for great industrial expansion if the South and West are to enjoy the industrial advantages that obtain in New England. Fifteen million utilized horsepower means the conservation of about 100,000,000 tons of coal per annum, costing at this time about $225,000,000 annually in the boiler furnaces, and the conservation of the labor of about 280,000 miners and steam station operatives annually for other uses; $225,000,000 would buy 2,250,000 acres of good cultivated farm land. Suppose, instead of wasting, as we now are, $225,000,000 worth of coal and labor per annum, in some way we were destroying 2,250,000 acres of our farms every year, how long would it take our good voters to make a noise that would be heard and acted upon in Washington, to the end that the farm-destroying would cease? And yet that in effect is exactly what is going on to-day in the water-power field. The 280,000 laborers would be available for other safer, more useful, and healthful employment, affording general relief to the agricultural and manufacturing industries.

The development of our remaining water powers is not only important from a coal and labor saving standpoint, but from the standpoint as well of new industries that we need in the United States which can not be based on coal or oil power. Among such industries are the manufacture of fertilizers, nitric acid for explosives, many electrochemical products, high-grade steel, irrigation pumping, and other general and very useful industries requiring cheap power that are now unable to locate here. Over 1,250,000 horsepower has been developed in Norway and Sweden in the last 10 years for the manufacture of nitric acid and fertilizers, and no similar progress has been made in the United States. We now import more than $50,000,000 worth of materials a year for fertilizers and explosives in this country, all of which could in time be produced in our own country. It is common report that designs are now being perfected in Canada for the development of water power where American capital to the eventual tune of about $75,000,000 plans to manufacture fertilizers and nitric acid for consumption for the most part in the United States. Another large and beneficial use of power is that of pumping water for large irrigation projects in the West. There are hundreds of thousands of acres of land now valueless which will, if cheap power can be secured, be made productive and valuable. Many other similar instances could be noted if space permitted.

Hydrolecertric engineering is a new science, and it has had to be learned in the usual expensive though very instructive school of experience. The art is less than 30 years old, and the first 22 or 23 years had to be spent in education, and as a result a lot of investors, not only in the United States, but all over the world, were bitterly disappointed. In the United States alone poor engineering and undue optimism caused, from 1900 to 1910, 12 water powers to go into liquidation; more than 600,000 horsepower of developments and $120,000,000 worth of disappointed capital went on the black list with investors. This unfortunate stage of engineering has now happily passed; but about the time that engineers had learned their lesson and were able conservatively to design and estimate water-power plants, and about the time the optimists and commercial men had learned that it is necessary to sell hydroelectric power for about 65 per cent of the cost of steam power, along came a wail all over the United States, because, it was said, a so-called Water-Power Trust was robbing the people, and then began a campaign in Government circles and in magazines that reduced the water-power industry to its present state of innocuous desuetude. Much literature was distributed all over the country for the purpose of acquainting the American people with the alleged wonderful and deplorable discovery that the water powers of the country were being grabbed by a so-called Water Power Trust, which was making undue and tremendous profits out of this natural resource. As only one side of the question was presented, the story was believed and water-power companies have been looked upon with suspicion ever since. Whatever the object of this unwarranted attack, the average citizen who has given no extended thought to this question is possessed with the idea that the water-power industry has been a very profitable one, and that there exists a Water Power Trust which is engaged in grabbing everything in sight. Any intelligent truth seeker who has honestly investigated the subject has found that no Water Power Trust exists now or ever has existed, and furthermore never can exist in the face of a steam competition which no aggregation of capital could possibly control; that no banker is seeking investment in new water projects; that practically every banker who has ever made an investment of this class for his clients will recite a hard-luck story of disappointed expectations and hopes; that the market has been flooded with prospectuses and reports on projects which no substantial investment interest will take up because of the present general unpopularity of water-power securities.

The popular theory that water powers provide an easy road to wealth is not shared by anyone of experience in the industry. The uninitiated are naturally not aware of the many hazards connected with most water-power developments. Without going into details, I will merely suggest that a little thought upon the subject will convince any intelligent person that the hazards attached to both the construction and operation of hydroelectric plants are greater than those attached to almost any other class of business that can be mentioned.

It is a great pity that prior to the rigors of the Government restrictive action an intelligent official investigation of the subject was not made. If such investigation had been made, it is certain that the action would not have ensued, and from that time until now about 2,000,000 horsepower now going to waste would have been developed, with its attending blessings to the public, including the conservation of a coal and labor cost of more than $100,000,000. In 1907 Gov. Hughes was the only governor out of 27 governors in the United States who recognized that "justice first" was a fundamental principle always working for the greatest good to the greatest number. He alone of 27 governors in other States whose legislatures had passed similar laws vetoed a 2-cent railway-fare law passed by the New York Legislature, on the ground that it was the duty of the legislature first to ascertain what was a just rate, and then establish it. The action of Gov. Hughes showed an intelligence that some day will be demanded by the people of all their representatives; and when "justice first" is on the desks of a majority of our legislators, then, and not before, the water-power question and a lot of other questions will get the best solution in the public interest.

As a result of the campaign above noted and the absence of any investigation disclosing water-power facts and conditions, laws were passed that have practically stopped development all over the United States on navigable rivers and public lands, and the Federal laws passed governing these two classes of development, which are still in effect, make it impossible, on account of restrictions, regulatory provisions, and revocable permits, to secure capital from any source. For a time after these laws were put into effect some money for American water powers was secured in England, France, and Belgium; but this source of supply is now for a very long time, if not permanently, destroyed by the European war. It therefore becomes necessary to secure American capital for all future developments, and in order to accomplish this the laws must be changed so that they will provide security and fairness for the investor and consumer and at the same time fully protect the public interest. Under the existing laws there may be granted the right to build a dam on the public lands of the United States and operate it for an indeterminate period, but at any time all rights can be revoked by a Secretary of the Interior in his discretion, without a hearing, and such action has actually been taken. Manifestly, such an experiment was doomed to failure, and the idea is without any present advocacy and is mentioned as one of the evils of legislation passed without knowledge of the subject legislated about.

It is stated by some who oppose changing the present laws for development of water power on public lands that there is no necessity or demand for additional developments in the West, because some existing power companies have sufficient power unsold to supply the present and near-future market. The suggestion by Government officials that great areas of territory in the West and South shall be deprived of industrial growth through water-power assistance until these few restricted districts have consumed all their developed power is so unfair and unsound economically as to be almost pitiful. Our railways had to overdevelop that the country might develop, and the same is true of the water-power industry. It can also be said that in the entire United States to-day there is not a single water power developed that can offer power terms justifying the establishment of fertilizer works, electrochemical works, large irrigation projects, or nitrogen fixation plants. It can also be said that there are now tentatively under serious consideration in the United States new developments that will call for more than $75,000,000, all waiting for encouraging legislation only. Must our unnecessary importations, amounting to $50,000,000 a year, and many other crying needs, wait until a few western plants can sell out a small amount of power now unsold? I do not think the people will take kindly to this idea. Furthermore, if it should turn out in the future that more power is developed than can be immediately sold, such a condition is hardly one which the public or the Government need worry about, so long as the people reserve to themselves the right to regulate power rates.

Another little-known fact about water power that bears upon the question with peculiar force at this time is the one of profit in water-power investments. Steam competition has driven the prices for power lower and lower for the past 25 years, and while the cost of practically every other human necessity has been mounting upwards each year the cost of power has been steadily going downward, and this process was strongly established long before State public-utility commissions were created. For water powers to compete with these steadily declining steam costs has been very difficult. In 1912 over 5,000 power stations investigated by the Department of Commerce showed that the steam stations were earning a surplus of 4.1 per cent above fixed charges and the water-power companies were earning only 1.78 per cent. This 1.78 per cent showing is a fine tribute to the financial genius and grabbing results of the alleged Water Power Trust. Investors will not be attracted to securities afflicted with strong competition and many and great risks—legal, commercial, and physical—for a surplus anything like as low as 1.78 per cent; and the reason for their attitude is easily found in the fact that the investors can go into many other safer fields and make much more.

That the water powers of the country are not being developed and that this lack of development is a grave industrial calamity, are facts the accuracy of which can not be successfully challenged. The question then arises as to what is needed to cause the business to revive and assume its proper place in our national life. I believe that the following conditions should exist in the laws governing water-power development in order to make it possible to place this class of securities at home, where they should be owned; they can not hereafter be sold abroad, anyway.

In the first place, the franchise term should be irrevocable in character and for not less than 50 years. At the end of 50 years the Government should have the right to take over the property of the power company by paying for the fair value of the property, the franchise rights and lands contributed by the Government to be excluded from payment. The lessee should have the right to continue until the property is taken over. There should be no Federal charge on the water power, except such small amount representing rental value of land and cost of Government administration of the lease, so long as its steam and other water-power competitors are not similarly charged. It is a well-recognized fact that any substantial Federal charges must be paid by the consumer, because there is no one else to pay them. Why, therefore, should new sets of consumers be obliged to pay additional charges which present consumers are not assessed?

On the question of Federal charges. Suppose the United States Government should say to the farmers in the country, "On all the wheat you sell in your own State you need pay no charge, but on any wheat subject to interstate freight rates, which rates we have jurisdiction over, you must pay the United States Government 1 cent per bushel." What legislator could survive such an advocacy? Yet in what way is the proposal more unjust than to make a charge on water powers that the Government takes dominion over, letting the 6,000,000 horsepower already developed go free from any such charge? Justice first would exclude the imposition of any such load. The general public may be said to be the power-consuming public, and anything done to increase the cost of constructing or operating power plants becomes a charge on the public. One of the greatest factors in the cost of a power plant is the cost of securing the money to build it. Water-power investments should be taxed by the States in which the plants are located, the same as any other business concern is taxed, but should not, in addition, have to bear a Federal charge which will be paid by the public through increased power rates and through increased cost of securing money. It would be just as reasonable for the general borrowing public, including farmers and manufacturers, to advocate legislation which would force the banks to increase the rates at which money could be loaned to them as to urge or permit laws which make the securing of money for water-power development more costly. If the water-power business were one of great profit or ever had been, if the business by its very nature and by its very competitive environments were not always forcing prices to the consumer downward, and if the prices now being paid by consumers generally were not greatly less than coal-produced power costs, then there might be some justification for stretching a point as against other industries and levying a charge, because the water powers really belong to the whole people.

Upon the question of regulation of rates to be charged by a water power the rates the consumers pay should be fixed by the consumers themselves through their own public-service commissions in all States which have commissions. The regulation of rates by any Cabinet officer is wrong in practice, except temporarily pending the establishment of commissions in a few States which still lack them. If the rates fixed by the State commissions are unfair to either power companies or consumers, either party can appeal to the people and eventually secure justice. As the consuming public through the commissions regulate the rates which they pay for power, and as the rates must be sufficiently high to include all taxes and Federal Government charges, as well as any increased interest cost on the investment occasioned thereby, is it not in the direct interest of the consuming public to insist upon all laws which will enlist money at the lowest possible rates, thereby materially aiding themselves to lower power rates?

What, then, may we expect if laws regarding water power are made attractive to American investors? We may expect low rates and a gradual and certain revival of water-power installation. Tentative plans for the expenditure of more than $75,000,000 in this class of work are now awaiting the enactment of fair laws. Every dollar of this investment will aid in creating a cheaper human necessity for the people and place no new burden on anybody's back. We may also expect that the 15,000,000 horsepower still undeveloped will yearly grow less and less and finally this undeveloped resource will take its rightful place and be a great benefit to our population all over the land; that many millions we now send out of our country annually for necessary products will be kept at home. If we are a Nation of red-blooded men capable of providing for and defending ourselves from within, we will make our own fertilizers and much-needed chemicals and explosives instead of depending upon foreign countries as we do now. If space permitted, much more could be said regarding the blessings that are easily obtainable by the passing of conservative and encouraging laws. Why not pass them?

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to an amendment which I have offered to the pending water-power bill. The amendment is on the desks of Senators. It proposes to add to the water-power bill some 16 or more sections. The amendment covers the entire plan of organization embodied in the bill, popularly known as the Newlands-Broussard bill, which has been urged for years before this body. That bill is the output and the product of an agitation, which has been conducted ever since the time of Mr. Roosevelt's administration; an agitation which Mr. Roosevelt himself actively conducted, and to which he gave point by the organization of the Inland Waterways Commission, composed of two Senators, two Representatives, and certain chiefs of the scientific services of the Government, such as the Reclamation and Forestry Services, the Engineer Corps of the Army, and others, for the purpose of investigating conditions that related to the improvement of our rivers and presenting to the President a complete scheme of legislation regarding that subject as the basis of his recommendatory powers. The Members from the Senate were Senator Warner, of Missouri, and myself. The Members from the House were Messrs. Burton, of Ohio, and BANKHEAD, of Alabama, both of whom were subsequently elected to the Senate.

Whilst that investigation was pending I offered in the Senate a bill substantially the amendment now presented as an amendment to the water-power bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if there have been hearings on his bill? If so, have they been published, and where are they available?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, there were hearings, for the bill has been introduced in various forms and has been referred to the Commerce Committee, of which I was at one time a member. There the general subject of waterway legislation was considered in different hearings upon different bills. There was a hearing upon this bill before the Committee on Commerce. The result of that hearing was that, as the Committee on Commerce of the Senate was unable to come to any conclusion regarding it, it submitted the bill to the Senate without recommendation. I made a report, the data of which I shall be glad to insert in the RECORD.

The Committee on Commerce, however, has been so intent upon the consideration of individual projects within the boundaries of the various States of the Union represented by members of the committee that it apparently never had time to pursue a general scheme of legislation providing for the union of the various scientific services of the country that relate to water, providing for cooperation with the States in the water development, and providing a sufficient fund for continuous work. The attention of the members of the committee in the main has been taken up with very important matters of legislation outside of waterway development, and, in association with that subject, with the consideration of specific projects that have been initiated in Congress, and to which the seal of the approval of the Corps of Engineers of the United States had been given.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada whether his proposed amendment does not really cover what is included in the bill that is now before the Senate? In other words, would not the commission that his amendment provides for have full authority to determine what dams shall be built in navigable streams and to control the question of the use of water for purposes of navigation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. In my judgment, it would; and I wish to state that, if the amendment which I propose, embracing about 20 additional sections, is adopted as an amendment to the pending bill, then "the waterways commission" should be substituted for "the Secretary of War" in the preceding sections of the pending bill.

Mr. WORKS. That is just what I was going to suggest. There would evidently be a conflict between the bill as it is now before the Senate and the proposed amendment of the Senator from Nevada, and there would have to be something to harmonize the inconsistent provisions.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. The idea suggested itself to my mind that the Senator's amendment should have been offered as a substitute rather than as an amendment to the pending bill, because it does cover the subject, and, I think, much more satisfactorily than the bill which we are now considering.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator from California that I will consider the matter during the discussion, and it may be better to take the course which he suggests.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a question, would the amendment which he has submitted, if it were adopted, obviate the necessity for the annual river and harbor bill? Does it cover the same questions as are involved in the river and harbor bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The proposal which I submit simply covers the rivers, not the harbors. My idea is that the harbors relate mainly to foreign commerce, while the rivers relate to interstate commerce. The harbors have been well attended to in the history of this country under the present system. The defect has been in the proper organization of the work upon our rivers, and one of the purposes of this amendment is to divorce the rivers from the harbors and to put river development under the practical control of a departmental commission, consisting of four department chiefs, with the President at the head.

I have caused to be put upon the desks of Senators a map which shows how the fund created by this proposed act will be apportioned in the different watersheds of the country, and I invite the attention of Senators to this map in connection with my remarks.

Mr. President, we are dealing with the subject of water. The purpose of the pending bill is to make the water of the country an asset. Hitherto it has been a liability. The water of our rivers, properly treated and managed and controlled, should be a national asset of vast value. Under existing conditions it is productive of great loss when massed in floods. To-day the entire lower Mississippi Valley is suffering from a destructive flood, which not only threatens great agricultural areas, but large towns and cities. Only a few months ago the State of Kansas, hitherto free from afflictions of this kind, was devastated by a flood involving a loss of $30,000,000. Two years or more ago Ohio was afflicted with a similar flood, causing a destruction aggregating between $50,000,000 and $100,000,000; and every year, whether it be on the lower Mississippi, on the Ohio, on the Missouri, on the Sacramento, or on the Columbia River, or their tributaries, the volume of loss inflicted upon the Republic by floods is constantly increasing.

Mr. President, water is one of the great elements, just as essential to mans' existence as air and earth. We can imagine nothing into which water does not enter as an element. It constitutes 75 per cent of our human structure, of our plant structure, and of animal life. It is the one thing which, applied to our desert plains, will make them productive and capable of maintaining large populations; and yet the main record that water has made in this country thus far has been one of destruction and loss.

Thus far how have we treated this water which falls from the heavens upon our mountains and plains? We have permitted it to flow from the small streams into the large streams, to mass in the lower reaches of the rivers and overflow lands and towns and cities, and to the waters thus massed and developing an enormous momentum, we oppose bank revetment and the artificial barriers, called levees, constructed farther back on the various rivers. Our legislation thus far in aid of navigation has been almost entirely limited to channel work, bank revetment, and levee construction, which serves the double purpose of maintaining a fixed channel and at the same time protecting the adjoining lands from overflow. In other words, we have allowed the water to reach its highest point of effectiveness in destruction before we attack the problem.

I ask, what is the sensible way of attacking this problem? It is to catch the waters and control them as soon as possible after they fall from the heavens, and to put them under restraint where they fall, by the construction wherever practicable of reservoirs that can be used for irrigation or for the development of water power or for the storage of water for intensive cultivation, and by so adapting our methods of cultivating the soil to the conservation of water as to enable the soil itself to drink up and absorb the maximum quantity of water that falls from the heavens, instead of allowing it to slip over the surface of the soil into our streams and creeks and rivers.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying, if he shall be permitted to proceed in single file, but if he shall not, then if it were not a violation of the rule I should propose that we proceed to the consideration of this question in columns of fours. That method might shorten the time in which all Senators could be heard. There is so much noise in the Chamber that we can not hear anything the Senator says, and he is discussing a very important question. I should like to have order in the Chamber that I may hear what he says. One may not always agree with the learned Senator from Nevada, but whether I agree with the honorable Senator or not, I find him invariably interesting and instructive.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was inquiring as to what was the logical and scientific method of treating this water, and I was insisting upon it that the thing to do is to seize the waters as soon as possible after they fall from the heavens and to place every possible obstruction upon the flow of those waters as they advance through our creeks and our rivers and our main streams to our gulfs and oceans, so that during this intervening period they can be put to every beneficial use and prevented from exercising any destructive influence.

The main difficulty with these great floods is that these masses of water, which ought to be distributed in the stream equally and evenly throughout the entire year, maintaining as nearly as possible a standard flow, are allowed, because of our want of care and vigilance, to gather together during certain seasons—one or two months in the spring—and to mass themselves to the destruction of all property and lives within their reach. The problem is simply to slow down the progress of these rivers from the remote interior to our gulfs and oceans in such a way as that a standard flow of the rivers can be maintained for navigation, the rivers never being either swollen by floods or attenuated by droughts, thus maintaining a standard flow for the ships of commerce.

Mr. President, this water is eternally taking its circular course, drunk up by the sun from the gulfs and the oceans, carried by the winds in clouds to the remote interior, and precipitated there upon the land as a benefaction to mankind. Yet thus far our main idea has been, instead of seizing those waters and putting them to a beneficial use, to hurry them on by every artificial means to the source from which they originally came, and hurry them on in such a way as to mass them for destruction.

How do we hurry them? Why, we have been destroying our forests, great natural reservoirs of moisture into which the waters fall from the heavens, and where they are stored in the leaves and the loose soil, and drunk up by the thirsty roots of the trees and vegetation, and thence the surplus gradually makes its way to the creeks and tributaries of our rivers. We have destroyed our forests, and the water which used to be absorbed by these forests is now hurried on into the creeks and rivers.

In the vicinity of every river, whether it is a main river or a tributary river, are vast areas of land called swamp lands, lands which are overflowed by the rivers, whether tributary or main. They constitute the natural reservoirs for the surplus waters that fall in our interior regions, and as the waters fall they are distributed and held over a large area instead of being precipitated rapidly into the rivers. We have been engaged in the reclamation of all those lands. In every State in the country where rivers are you will find such swamp lands. On the Mississippi River, all the way from Omaha down to St. Louis, are vast areas of swamp lands which they have been engaged in reclaiming; and what does reclamation mean? Why, that the surplus waters, the overflow waters of the rivers, instead of flowing over these lands, are prevented from flowing over them by levees erected, and so are forced into the streams themselves; and these waters, thus accumulating, constitute a part of the vexing force that threatens annihilation below Cairo and other stretches of other rivers resembling that vast stretch between Cairo and the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Every acre of land reclaimed for cultivation above Cairo means the destruction of a possible reservoir for so much water, which, instead of making its way precipitately down the main stream during the period of flood, would make its way gradually and slowly into the tributary streams, and thence into the main stream. The result is that upon these great rivers we have the contradictions of an enormous altitude and extreme expansion during the periods of flood, and just as extreme contraction at other times during periods of drought.

To what useful purposes can these waters be put? In the first place, in all the streams that have their source in arid or semiarid regions these waters can be used in the reclamation of the deserts, containing a soil as fruitful as any in the world, kissed by a kindly sun that in every way stimulates production, and needing only moisture to reach the fullness of production; and every gallon of water that is thus diverted over these arid plains is prevented from increasing the flood period, for it is taken out of these streams during the period of the melting snows in the spring, carried over the plains, and prevented from reaching the lower levels of the river during the period of flood. That water, saturating the soil of the arid plains and aiding in plant production there, as to its surplus gradually seeps back to the stream from which it was originally taken and swells that stream during the summer period, the period of drought, when we need water for purposes of navigation.

The reason why the navigation of rivers has not been as successful in this country as it has been in such countries as France, Germany, and Austria is that there water is put to every beneficial use. Water is slowed up on its way to the oceans in order to put it to beneficial use, and in the slowing-up process retarding water the flow of the river is practically standardized throughout the entire year so as to permit of navigation, whereas in this country our rivers are either at one extreme or the other, the maximum of flood or the minimum of stream exhaustion.

If we pursue this method of retarding and slowing up by every known artificial device the progress of the waters, as soon as they fall from the heavens, toward the oceans, we put them to the beneficial use of irrigation, we put them to the beneficial use of water-power development, for the fall of water from one level to another is the cheapest source of power known in the world, and to-day hydroelectric energy enters more into the comfort and convenience of the average life of an American than any other element, contributing light, contributing power, and, ultimately, contributing heat to the households of the land.

Then, too, this water, if slowed up, can be used even in the humid region during the period of drought. Why, in Germany they use irrigation as much as they do in the arid region. Why? Not because it is arid, not because they have not an abundance of rain, but because the fall of rain from the heavens is not scientifically adjusted anywhere in the world. No process has been invented for tapping the clouds as the interests of man require. The result is that they have periods of drought over there in the humid region just as they have periods of drought here; and they store these waters for use in the dry period, the result being a vast increase in the production of the soil, amply warranting the expenditure made in this kind of development.

Then the control of the river also means the development of swamp lands and the lower reaches of the river for purposes of production. It may be asked: "Well, if the result of reclaiming swamp lands on the tributary streams is to shed that water to the river and add to its accumulation in floods, is it not even more unwise to reclaim the flood lands on the lower reaches of the rivers, in regions resembling that vast area on the Mississippi between Cairo and the mouth?"

My answer to that question is: "Yes; if you do levee that land, if you do hem the waters in the stream in such a way as to prevent the natural overflow over millions of acres of land whose natural condition is that of swamp land, of course you add to the intensity of the flood in the channel itself." That is true; but, even in that region, if you pursue a comprehensive and scientific system of treating that vast area of swamp lands, you can take certain portions of them that are exceedingly low, and you can perhaps artificially increase their depth by dredging in such a way as to mass the flood waters in reservoirs, even in that region, in a contracted area, the contracted area, owing to its greater depth, holding as much water as a very much larger area of swamp land in its natural state would hold. Thus, as you increase the depth of the reservoirs you increase their capacity to hold water, and you increase the number of acres of land hitherto swamp land that you can devote to cultivation.

Then, in addition to that, there is a scientific way of treating the main river itself. Taking the Mississippi River as an example, all the waters upon nearly two-thirds of the Union finally make their way to the Mississippi River in Louisiana and Mississippi, and of course the accumulation is enormous; and yet it is entirely practicable to relieve the stream at that point by giving it another mouth, which would divide the stream above New Orleans, and thus enable a greater outflow into the Gulf. It would be quite possible, if necessary, to provide two or three or four such mouths. The fact is that there are three there now, naturally, but they join away below New Orleans; whereas if the Atchafalaya River were connected in some way with the main river it would add a fourth mouth to the river. That river, I believe, takes its source in the Red River just adjoining the Mississippi River.

So that by these various scientific processes for slowing up the progress of the water as it falls from 27 States in its progress to the ocean and thus minimizing the accumulation of these waters in floods, you can, by these various practical devices—storage and canals for irrigation of arid lands, storage for the development of water power, storage for the purpose of increasing the intensiveness of production of the humid region, storage in forests, storage in soil so scientifically cultivated as to increase absorption, control of swamp areas for reclamation, and, above all, the protection of a steady stream for navigation—write on one side of your ledger millions of dollars annually to the credit side of the waterway development of the country, and you can diminish the entries that are now being made every year of the losses that are the result of extensive floods.

We have been pottering with this subject for a hundred years or more. The American people, claiming the proud distinction of being one of the most intelligent peoples in the world, have been pottering with this subject as if it were a new subject; viewing it with suspicion and distrust; afraid to advance with confidence; and yet other parts of the world no so favored naturally have already solved the problem. When we were conducting the agitation for the irrigation of arid lands, an agitation that sprang from the West and took over 30 years in the accomplishment of its purpose, including 10 years of active agitation in the House of Representatives, I can recall that during that time we had to demonstrate to the people of the Middle West and to the people of the New England States that irrigation could be practiced, in face of the historical fact that for thousands of years irrigation has been practiced and centuries ago was the source of life of nearly two-thirds of the then known human race. Yet we had to take up that question historically and scientifically and demonstrate before chambers of commerce and boards of trade and in magazine articles and speeches on the floor of the Senate and House that irrigation was practicable. It took us years to demonstrate it.

I see to-day cautious men, cautious men living on the lower Mississippi itself, saying the only thing to do is to build the levees higher and higher in order to meet constantly increasing encroachments of the constantly accumulating floods, because the problem has got to be studied for the future, the whole country has got to be surveyed, plans have got to be made, and you have got to determine what? Determine the practicability. I have heard that statement from men whose constituencies are suffering every year from overflow, and who have opposed the great and comprehensive measure which is now before the Senate in this amendment simply because they think no demonstration has been made.

You have only to go to Germany and to France and to Austria to find that all the rivers and their tributaries have been highly artificialized; that in France the rivers have been connected with each other by artificial canals so that you can go just as completely from one part of France to another through rivers and the canals as you can go by rail itself.

You find the same demonstration in Germany, where they have developed not only all the incidental things connected with waterway development, the incidental benefits of irrigation and water-power development and swamp-land reclamation, but where they have developed the most magnificent system of transportation in the world, a system that is the handmaid of commerce, both domestic and foreign, and which involves a complete dovetailing of rail transportation, river transportation, and ocean transportation, all of them made the servants of commerce in the utmost perfection.

Yet we have done nothing, practically, with reference to our rivers except to fool with the channels, to dig out sand bars here and there, and to respond to the demands of local communities, not for the promotion of navigation but for the protection of private lands which are threatened with overflow.

We are told by the distinguished ex-Senator from Ohio, Mr. Burton, who is more familiar with our rivers and harbors than probably any other man in the United States, and who has made little practical application of his judgment to our rivers, that the improvement of our rivers for navigation is a failure; that the railways have monopolized and will monopolize traffic. Why? Because we have never perfected the rivers as an instrumentality of commerce or attempted to perfect them. We have contented ourselves with digging sand bars, and we have in some cases leveed the banks, but we have never artificialized a river, as the Germans and the French do, for the purposes of commerce.

What does the development of our rivers for purposes of commerce mean? It means the construction of wharves, warehouses, and transfer facilities, the acquisition of transfer sites, and a complete coordination with our railways. We have allowed our railways to sandbag our water carriers without protecting our water carriers by the law, and then we have failed to give our water carriers a perfected instrumentality, which means not only a steady channel, a steady flow of water, but wharves, warehouses, and transfer facilities and a coordination of rail and water carriage.

You might as well say that you could perfect railway transportation by building a railway across the continent, leaving out the rails every 10 miles and leaving out sidetracks, warehouses, and stations, as to contend that you can make a river an instrumentality of commerce under the conditions which have prevailed with reference to their development.

How have the water carriers been enabled to sustain themselves in this unequal conflict? Sandbagged by the railways during the period of navigability that put down their rates to the point of loss, without terminal facilities, without transfer facilities, without stations or warehouses, unprotected by the law, the individual carrier, the owner of a steamboat, has been compelled to struggle against these tremendous odds, and because he has not succeeded the former Senator from Ohio, after years of investigation, practically declares that the improvement of our rivers for purposes of commerce is a failure.

Would the Germans have succeeded under such a system? Did they allow the railways to sandbag the water carriers? Did they say, "We will perfect railways in every way with single and double tracks and sidetracks and stations and warehouses and the most perfect facilities for transportation, and all we will do on our rivers is to dredge a sand bar here and there, or here and there put up some levees for the protection of some swampland proprietor"? Did they content themselves with that, perfecting the railway system and allowing the river system to take care of itself?

No; they practically artificialized every river throughout its entire course and the tributaries, and not only that but they connected them by canals entirely artificial in their creation, and to-day waterway transportation is just as important as railway transportation, and it is important because it is the cheapest known method of transportation, for you can carry enormous bulk in barges and steamers. In a single barge itself you can carry as much as can be carried in an entire train. The cheapness of carriage to-day from Pittsburgh down to New Orleans of coal and iron indicates how cheap that transportation is.

Now, Mr. President, the Democratic Party is under a peculiar obligation to do something upon this great subject, for whilst the Republican Party for years has been contenting itself with general phrases the Democratic Party in two conventions has declared in the most specific terms, first, for the coordination of all the scientific services of the Government that relate to water so that their plans shall dovetail with each other; second, for the cooperation of the Nation with the State so that each can cooperate with the other in the formation of plans and the construction of works belonging to their respective jurisdictions; and, third, the creation of an ample fund for continuous work covering every watershed in the country.

I will ask to insert these various planks of the platform of 1908 and the platform of 1912 in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM, 1908.

WATERWAYS.

Water furnishes the cheaper means of transportation, and the National Government, having the control of navigable waters, should improve them to their fullest capacity. We earnestly favor the immediate adoption of a liberal and comprehensive plan for improving every water course in the Union which is justified by the needs of commerce; and to secure that end we favor, when practicable, the connection of the Great Lakes with the navigable rivers and with the Gulf through the Mississippi River and the navigable rivers with each other by artificial canals, with a view of perfecting a system of inland waterways to be navigated by vessels of standard draft.

We favor the coordination of the various services of the Government connected with waterways in one service for the purpose of aiding in the completion of such a system of inland waterways, and we favor the creation of a fund ample for continuous work, which shall be conducted under the direction of a commission of experts to be authorized by law.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM, 1912.

WATERWAYS.

We renew the declaration in our last platform relating to the conservation of our natural resources and the development of our waterways. The present devastation of the lower Mississippi Valley accentuates the movement for the regulation of river flow by additional bank and levee protection below and the diversion, storage, and control of the flood waters above, and the utilization for the beneficial purposes in the reclamation of arid and swamp lands and the development of water power instead of permitting the floods to continue, as heretofore, agents of destruction.

We hold that the control of the Mississippi River is a national problem. The preservation of the depth of its water for the purpose of navigation, the building of levees to maintain the integrity of its channel, and the prevention of the overflow of the land and its consequent devastation, resulting in the interruption of interstate commerce, the disorganization of the mail service, and the enormous loss of life and property, impose an obligation which alone can be discharged by the General Government.

To maintain an adequate depth of water the entire year, and thereby encourage water transportation, is a consummation worthy of legislative attention and presents an issue national in its character. It calls for prompt action on the part of Congress, and the Democratic Party pledges itself to the enactment of legislation leading to that end.

We favor the cooperation of the United States and the respective States in plans for the comprehensive treatment of all waterways with a cooperative plan for channel improvement, with plans for drainage of swamp and overflowed lands, and to this end we favor the appropriation by the Federal Government of sufficient funds to make surveys of such lands, to develop plans for drainage of the same, and to supervise the work of construction.

We favor the adoption of a liberal and comprehensive plan for the development and improvement of our inland waterways with economy and efficiency, so as to permit their navigation by vessels of standard draft.

Mr. NEWLANDS. You will observe that they deal with the utmost amplification regarding this subject.

Mr. President, we pledged ourselves in 1908 to do this thing, and we did not do it, because we were not in power. We pledged ourselves in 1912, not only repeating the assurance of 1908, but supplementing it and amplifying it, and we have been in power three years. What has been done? The people of the Mississippi Valley will hold us to a responsibility upon this subject. The people gave their command in the platform of 1912. Have we sought to respond to it, or have we made the least effort toward a practical solution of this question?

I will admit, Mr. President, that we have had numerous and complicated problems to solve during the past three years, but Congress is so organized through its different committees that it is unnecessary to put all its work upon a single track. There is no reason why the contemporaneous operation of all the committees should not have resulted in the committee having jurisdiction of this subject bringing in a full and comprehensive measure of this kind.

The American people will hold us responsible unless we shall do something, and the necessity for action is now accentuated by the terrific flood on the Mississippi River to-day, by the flood that occurred in Kansas four or five months ago, and by the destructive flood that occurred in Ohio two years ago. We have instructions from our constituents, from the people themselves, assembled in convention, and we have had warning ever since of the results of inaction through the destructive floods that have devastated the country.

Now, I am very reluctant to intrude upon the pending bill, but, Mr. President, for 10 years I have been urging this measure. I find that the disposition of Congress is to deal with detached elements of the water question instead of the water question as a whole, and that if we do not look out we shall have legislation upon every detail without having legislated upon the subject in a full and comprehensive manner, and we will have our development a detached and disjointed development, not meeting in any way the requirements of the country and ultimately condemning the whole system to public disapproval.

My disposition was, when the Appalachian bill came up, to insist upon the consideration of this measure as an amendment to it. What was that bill? A bill which provided for the acquisition of mountain lands denuded of timber in the Appalachian Mountains and in the White Mountains. Under what power was that legislation sought? Under the interstate-commerce power. How? It was claimed that it affected navigation; that the effect of denuding these vast timber areas was to precipitate the water falling on them suddenly into streams, thus swelling the streams to enormous proportions and endangering navigation and preventing a stable flow of the streams.

At that time I proposed to offer as an amendment this measure, and I was dissuaded from doing so by the members of the committee having jurisdiction over it. They were afraid that the consideration of a big measure of this kind might imperil the bill, and I was in sympathy with the movement for the acquisition of large areas of denuded land at the source of streams.

I realized not only that those lands were shedding their waters into the streams just as a cemented surface would, but the soil was being stripped off of those lands and they were gradually being reduced to a condition of arditity, such as that which prevails in the mountains of China, where, as you view a mountani scene far distant, you do not observe great altitudes covered with trees and vegetation and green, but simply great, white, exposed surfaces, apparently of clay and stone, from which the soil has been stripped. That soil goes down into the streams and away into the ocean, where it serves no useful purpose. So I was for the acquisition of those lands as a part of a general system of conservation in this country—a system of conservation which would ultimately fit in with the great scheme of waterway development which I had in view. So, having received assurances from a number of the prominent men of that committee, assurances which I shall likely remind them of in the near future regarding this bill, I reconsidered my disposition to force this bill upon that measure. The measure went through, and for four or five years we have been buying those lands, and yet we have not done a thing to promote the navigation which their purchase was intended to stimulate.

We have all kinds of schemes when it comes to take up detached elements of this great plan. There is a drainage organization now in existence, organized in the Southern States; and they say that the only way to accomplish their purpose of getting Federal aid in the drainage of private lands is to show that it is a great national problem, and to divorce it from every other subject; and they present legislation here, and individual constituencies are enlisting the activities of their representatives in this body and in the other body. They may be, for aught I know, very meritorious enterprises so far as the public good is concerned; but all that I am complaining of is that we are steadily taking hold of detached elements of this great plan, without treating it scientifically and comprehensively; and in the end we are going to spend a great deal more money and to spend it much more ineffectively than if we adopt the big plan.

So, with this experience before me, not only of detached legislation in the past, upon which I have hesitated to intrude, but legislation threatened in the immediate future taking up detached portions, I have concluded that the only way is to fight every one of these detached proposals, unless there is incorporated in the bill itself the provisions of this general bill for which I stand.

I recollect that whilst the public opinion of Congress may not be made up on this subject, the public opinion of the country is made up, and it has been expressed in the national platforms of both parties; it has been expressed in waterway convention after waterway convention. Every irrigation congress for the last four years has indorsed this bill specifically by name; the drainage congress even indorsed it in a recent meeting; chambers of commerce and boards of trade throughout the country have indorsed it; and it has received the indorsement of the legislatures of eight States, and included among those States are the widely separated States of Louisiana, of Wisconsin, and of South Dakota.

Mr. President, this river-regulation bill can be amalgamated with the pending bill. I am not sure as to all the details of the pending bill; but I have great confidence in the formative minds of the Senators who have evolved it with reference simply to a single phase of the question, that of water power It may have some defects which may be pointed out to me, but my general sympathy is with the general purpose of the bill. In my judgment about all the change you would have to make in this bill in order to harmonize it with this amendment, which contains as many sections as does the pending bill itself, would be to substitute the commission provided in the amendment for the Secretary of War as the source of power.

What is that commission? Why, the Secretary of War is in it. It is a commission consisting of four Secretaries, chiefs of departments. Do you ask why are four included? Simply because there are four departments that are to-day struggling with the different phases of the water question, and I wish to coordinate all those departments in teamwork. It would be utterly impracticable to take these services from the departments with which they are at present connected and in which they are organized. Therefore the only way to get them in teamwork is through the department chiefs, and to constitute them a waterway commission, with the President of the United States at the head, so that he will be in touch with this great constructive work, and so that his entire Cabinet will be in touch with it, for the members of the commission will be members of the Cabinet. In this way we shall insure teamwork between the four departments and the numerous scientific services, numbering, I believe, about 20, engaged in the consideration of the different phases of the water question under their jurisdiction.

Now, you ask me, how many scientific services of this kind are there? Well, there is a new one cropping up pretty nearly every day, or, at any rate, every year; but, according to my recollection, the important ones are these: In the War Department there is an Engineer Corps of the Army, which has jurisdiction over what? Over irrigation? No. Over water-power development? No. Over drainage? No. Over swamp-land reclamation? No; except perhaps in a limited degree; but which has jurisdiction over the channels of the rivers—the rivers themselves as instrumentalities of interstate commerce. That bureau was put in the bill as one of the instrumentalities for its operation.

Then we have in the Interior Department the Reclamation Service, which is engaged in the reclamation of arid lands, intimately associated with this question, with a vast engineering force employed by it. We have also the Geological Survey, a scientific organization, which, with great industry and service to the country, has for years, long before we entered upon reclamation, been pursuing a study of the waters of the country. Then we have in the Agricultural Department the Forestry Service, intimately related to the development of our rivers. We have also the drainage service. We have in the Department of Commerce the Bureau of Fisheries, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and another service which I can not recall just now. Each one of these services is getting appropriations from Congress absolutely detached from all the others.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that the bill now up for consideration contemplates enabling the development of the water power of the country under all conditions as they exist, either in dry weather or wet weather, in full streams, or in other conditions? It would, therefore, scarcely seem advisable that such development should be delayed and wait upon the working out of a great scientific plan covering the whole country, largely aimed to affect flood control; in other words, the Senator's plan, it seems to me, might well go on, if it be favored, without in anywise interfering with what might be done under this bill if it shall be passed and go into operation. There is no such relation in the bill to the general, broad scheme as to make it advisable, it seems to me, to delay this proposed legislation and to make its operation wait upon the development of this larger and more ambitious plan, because the Senator's plan would not contemplate taking out of any of the rivers as they are to-day any of the water that is in them.

It would not contemplate interfering with any power development that might be inaugurated under the bill that is now pending if it should become a law; and consequently it would seem unfair to delay operations that might be authorized under this bill until this broad plan could be worked out, which might require years of time. For instance, it would take a long time to complete the flood-control canals, if they were determined upon; and, inasmuch as the final working out of the Senator's plan as proposed by him would not interfere with what might be accomplished under this bill, is it not advisable for us to act upon the measure before us, and then consider the broader plan afterwards? It seems to me there would be no conflict, and there would be no possible loss or disadvantage if we proceeded under the present bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, there is much plausibility in the statement made by the Senator from Florida. It is the same argument that has been made always when legislation has been sought upon a detatched portion of the water question. It is an argument to which I have yielded again and again, to find that the detached portion is put to the front, and the great and comprehensive plan is put to the rear.

There is nothing in the measure, if it shall be amalgamated with the pending bill, to interfere with or delay in any way the operations that are sought for by the water-power bill. Those provisions will gradually be perfected by this body; and then that measure and the amendment which I propose to amalgamate with that great scheme will simply dovetail into a great, comprehensive plan for dealing broadly and comprehensively with the waters of the country.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to ask the Senator a question. As I understood him just now, the provisions of the pending water-power bill could be later enacted into law subsequent to the adoption of the Senator's plan. Am I correct in so understanding?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; my idea is to have them both adopted at the same time. I propose to add the plan represented by the bill which I have been urging for some years as additional sections to the water-power bill, so that both will go into effect at the same time, and I provide that the water-power bill shall dovetail in with the provisions of the bill which I have been urging by giving the proposed waterways commission, consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Agriculture, the exercise of the powers which in the water-power bill are vested in the Secretary of War alone.

Mr. CLAPP. I have not had time to compare the two bills; but do I understand that the Senator in the bill he offers as a substitute has taken care of the provisions sought to be incorporated in the pending water-power bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. They will remain, as they may be perfected by the Senate in the consideration of the measure.

Mr. CLAPP. Will they remain in the Senator's substitute as they now stand? Will the same provisions remain that at present are incorporated in the pending bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. They will remain if my amendment is agreed to, for my amendment simply adds the river-regulation bill to the power bill, and leaves the power bill intact, subject, of course, to such amendment as the wisdom of the Senate shall impose.

Mr. CLAPP. Is there not the difficulty I am about to suggest in the Senator's plan? Of course, if it were simply offered as an amendment to the pending bill, I realize that it would meet objection on account of the amount which it is proposed to appropriate for the purpose contemplated. Being placed where it involves the provisions of the pending bill and also arbitrarily involves the same amount, is it not going to defeat the entire measure? Is Congress prepared at this time to make the appropriation which the Senator's bill contemplates?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think that is a very pertinent question, and I will address myself to it.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I should not regret at all if the proposed amendment of the Senator from Nevada should defeat the pending bill, because I am very much opposed to that bill on other grounds than those which have been mentioned; but the thing that is pressing upon my mind is that we are duplicating practically the same work by the bill and the amendment to it.

Here is a bill providing that the work contemplated shall be done at the discretion and under the direction of the Secretary of War. The proposed amendment provides that it shall be under the supervision of the Secretary of War and several other officers. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada is much more comprehensive, and, I think, is much better than the bill before the Senate. It is because of its comprehensive character and the amount of money that is involved in it that action upon it has been delayed. I think it is a matter that Congress should have dealt with long ago, and the Senator from Nevada is entitled to the gratitude of the country for his persistence in attempting to get this kind of legislation before the Senate and to secure its passage through the Congress.

As the Senator has said, independent measures covering one project alone have been constantly thrust into this question, and thereby the comprehensive measure which he proposes has been prevented from passage. I know that is true as to my own State, for, as the Senator knows very well, there is one project there which our people have very much at heart, and they are afraid that such a large bill will prevent the carrying out of that one measure which they have in mind and which is of interest to them alone. I think it is about time that we should take hold of this matter in a comprehensive way, as is proposed here, and secure some legislation that will deal with it in that way.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield further to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. I quite agree with the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]; but the reason this larger provision has been obliged from time to time to give way is the very magnitude of the project—not in its ultimate effect, for I think it would be the wiser way of reaching the problem—but the very magnitude of it as presented in its incipiency.

I want to say in passing that I believe the time will come when the relief of the American people from some very burdensome monopolies that exist to-day will be brought about through the capacity of the American people, with their water powers, not only to relieve against the floods of the lower rivers, but also to relieve against the loss of water that imperils and interferes with navigation, and at the same time to furnish the American people with a large proportion of their motor power, their light, and their heat. Some day we are going to reach that condition. Necessity will force us to it, if nothing else will ever awaken us to the necessity of it.

I want to say that I join my friend the Senator from California in the statement that there are some things about the pending bill which I may not be overly enthusiastic about, and yet there are some things in the bill that are of the most vital importance in vesting the General Government with authority, where it should have authority, to deal with this very question of using water power as a direct benefaction to the people, some things I would dislike to see lost at this time. That being true, the thought occurs to my mind whether, instead of presenting in its entirety this plan, which in its magnitude and in the magnitude of the initial appropriation is calculated, to say the least, to dampen enthusiasm for it, it is not possible, step by step, to secure that power, that coordination, that development of legislative policy, so that the step taken to-day will coordinate with the step taken to-morrow, and establish the principle which, once established, will then bear more readily a burden of large proportions. As it stands to-day, it is an immense project that is presented in the alternative, in such a form that we must choose between accepting it and losing whatever merit there may be in the pending bill. It seems to me it is an unfortunate way of putting the matter before the Senate.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Early in the present session I introduced a bill providing for what I called an industrial army, one of the objects of which was to provide means by which the very work that the Senator in his amendment proposes to do should be performed by an industrial army provided for that very purpose. The provisions of the bill were confined to conditions on the Pacific coast, but it could be extended to cover the conditions that prevail along the Mississippi River.

I made some remarks upon that bill at the beginning of the session. It would very materially aid in carrying out the object which the Senator has in view if there could be provided some such body of men, which could be resorted to at any and all times to do whatever might be necessary to carry that project into effect.

I may later on offer that bill, or a portion of it, as an amendment to the pending bill. It would be more appropriate as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada, because the two would work in admirably together. I do not know how much attention the Senator has given to the provisions of that bill; but if it could be embodied in such a measure as he has now, I think it would very materially aid in carrying out the object he has in view and is endeavoring to bring about.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will state that my attention was drawn to the bill which the Senator introduced. It struck me that it incorporated an excellent idea, and that in entering upon constructive work by the National Government, such as is contemplated in this amendment—work of a large and comprehensive character, employing many men—we might well consider the wisdom of accepting the Senator's idea, and in some way making this great constructive force a part of the reserve military force of the United States.

Mr. WORKS. One of the objects of the bill that I introduced was to provide at the same time a reserve military force. I must say that I regarded that as the least important part of the bill, however, because I am not very much alarmed about any necessity for the use of military force for a long time to come. But in carrying out the entire object as a whole, I provided for the military training for a part of the time of this same body of men, who by their work in the open would be prepared for military service and would have the endurance required for that service, and at the same time making them an army for industrial work, which I regarded as very much more important than their organization for military purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, Mr. President, I shall address myself to the question which has been raised by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator to permit me first to answer the question of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to make a suggestion in that connection. I will make this inquiry, so long as the Senator is going to address himself to that subject, if he will allow me. I see that the Senator estimates that an appropriation of $60,000,000 a year for 10 years will be required to accomplish this result.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. What I wanted to ask the Senator also to respond to is the query whether that is a mere estimate, and whether the actual requirement might not exceed that by a considerable sum; and, consequently, if we were launched upon this great scheme, whether the Senator believes we would come within the $600,000,000 or might greatly exceed it before we finished the project?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will address myself to that suggestion also, Mr. President.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] suggested that the very large financial proportions of this bill might prevent its fair consideration at the present time, when there is an apparent deficit in the revenue and when we are contemplating large military expenditures that probably will require additional taxation.

First, as to the financial proportions of the bill, it is true, as the Senator from Florida says, that this bill calls for an appropriation of $60,000,000 annually for a period of 10 years—$600,000,000 in all—apportioning this vast sum fairly between the different watersheds of the country. About $10,000,000 annually is apportioned to the watersheds of the Atlantic Ocean; $5,000,000 annually to the Gulf watersheds, exclusive of the Mississippi River; $10,000,000 annually to the lower Mississippi, from Cairo down; $5,000,000 annually to the Ohio River and its tributaries; $5,000,000 annually to the upper Mississippi and its tributaries; $5,000,000 annually to the Missouri River and its tributaries; $5,000,000 annually to the Colorado River and its tributaries; $5,000,000 annually to the Sacramento and the San Joaquin Rivers, of California, and their tributaries; and $5,000,000 annually to the Snake and the Columbia Rivers, the latter two rivers traversing the great States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho.

Six hundred million dollars is a large sum, and $60,000,000 annually is a large sum; but it is a very trifling sum compared with the amount that is annually expended in the development and increase of the railway transportation of the country, the interest upon which the American users of these railways are obliged to pay, and which in that sense constitutes just as much of a tax upon them as this particular expenditure. It has been estimated by Mr. Hill, of the Great Northern Railway, an acknowledged authority, that in the next five years it will be necessary for the railway systems to spend $5,000,000,000 in perfecting railway transportation—a billion dollars a year.

Why are we not appalled by the consideration of such a sum? Simply because we know that that expenditure will be so full of beneficial results as to warrant it, and that the increase in the business and transportation of the country will warrant the making of an expenditure of a billion dollars annually for five years, and warrant the payment by the American people of the interest upon that sum. We are not at all paralyzed when we think of that expenditure by private corporations of a quasi-public character, whose entire revenue is derived in the shape of rates which have the character of taxes fastened upon the transportation of the country. We are not alarmed. Why should we be alarmed about expending $600,000,000 in the next 10 years in perfecting the waterway transportation of the country, particularly when it has so many incidental advantages in the way of arid-land reclamation, water-power development, and swamp-land reclamation, as well as the promotion of navigation and of transportation?

Under this bill every watershed in the country will be covered, so that everybody will be interested. Work will progress contemporaneously. Projects will not be the result of a spoils system, the result of the power of an individual Senator or Congressman to advance a particular project in his State, and carry back the spoils to his own State as a recommendation for his retention in office. It will be a scientific system, under which science and business capacity and executive capacity will be united in the practical solution of the question.

In the second place, this amendment does not provide that that expenditure shall be made during the first year. It is to commence only with the year 1917, so that it presents no present problem of taxation. By 1917 it is very probable that the European war will be over, and many of the complications arising out of that war will have disappeared, so far as this country is concerned. I propose that during the intervening period the very moderate sum of a million dollars shall be expended in organization and plans, and also that a direct appropriation of $10,000,000 shall be made to relieve the conditions in the lower Mississippi, recognizing the obligation that rests upon us to meet that gigantic problem as speedily as possible.

The bill, therefore, will not add much to the budget of the next year—not more than $11,000,000; but, of course, we must at some time meet the question as to the raising of revenue that will cover an expenditure of this kind. We are to-day expending over a billion dollars annually, of which about $300,000,000 comes in as revenue from our Postal Service and is spent in the expenditures connected with that service, leaving a little over $700,000,000 to be derived from general taxation. Of that $700,000,000 over one-half is to-day spent upon wars, either future or past, $250,000,000 annually being our present expenditure for our Army and Navy, and $150,000,000 for the pension lists. So that out of a total net revenue, exclusive of the postal revenues, of a little over $700,000,000, $400,000,000 go to-day for military expenditures, and with the other $300,000,000 or more we are supporting the entire civil establishment of the country and doing the constructive work of the country.

Are these expenditures fairly apportioned? Ought we not to do more upon constructive work? In order to accomplish that work we must either reduce our military expenditures or increase our taxes, or go in debt. It is evident that we can not reduce our military expenditures. We must have the military force that will back up our assertion of our neutral rights. We are to-day asserting neutral rights throughout the world against the most powerful military countries of the world. Let us either abandon the assertion or back it up, not by aggressive force, not by a force organized for conquest, not by the organization of a force that is to increase the military spirit, but simply by the organization of the necessary force which must always lie behind the enforcement of law, whether it is international or domestic.

So it is probable that we shall have to increase the taxes for that purpose. Of course, one difficulty has been that we have had an unscientific military system instead of a scientific military system. Our large expenditure, for which we get less than any country in the world of a military character, is largely due to the inefficiency of our organization; and we shall have to establish in some way a greater efficiency as well as an increase of our military forces.

It may take $100,000,000 more of revenue to accomplish that, and we shall need $60,000,000 more for this constructive work. Well, why should we not raise it? Is the country bankrupt? Is ours a tax-burdened people? We have practically determined to do away with the burden of the stamp taxes, these war taxes which are an irritation to everybody.

We have practically determined to continue the sugar tax, but we will need more. Why should we not raise it frankly out of incomes and inheritances? You have to add only an additional 1 per cent to the existing tax to get $80,000,000 or $100,000,000 more. You have only to enlarge the area of the tax to get a considerable sum more. You have only to impose a tax on inheritances to raise a considerable sum, sharing that tax with the States themselves and arranging in some way that wherever the State imposes such a tax that tax shall be deducted from the tax imposed by the General Government to the extent, at least, of one-half. These two taxes, on incomes and inheritances, will give you all the money you want both for the military defense and the constructive work of the country.

This military expense will not be temporary; it will be continuous. Are we going to lay aside our plans for constructive work simply because we have to enlarge our Army and Navy? Germany to-day, in the very throes of war, imposing upon her people an enormous debt, which future generations will have to meet, is contemporaneously with her military expenditures making large constructive expenditures in that country. My attention was called only the other day to a statement from an authentic source of expenditures in Germany by the Empire of constructive work upon railways and rivers and plants such as are contemplated here, aggregating about $100,000,000; and if Germany in the struggle of war keeps up a constructive work side by side with its military expenditure can not the United States do it? If you are unwilling to tax, certainly the capacity of this country to contract debt is very large. We have expended on the Panama Canal over $400,000,000, over one-half of which has been raised from taxation, although that work contemplated a bond issue. Why should we not issue those bonds and put them in this waterway fund if we dislike to tax the people to-day for these expenditures? Why should we not have a waterways fund derived not only from taxation, but from a bond issue, a part of that bond issue being a part of the uncompleted bond issue of the Panama Canal?

This work is but a continuation of the work of the Panama Canal—an extension of it. It is work that is going to bring the entire Mississippi Valley in connection and communion with the Panama Canal and enable the restoration and the maintenance of industries in the Mississippi Valley that have been sadly affected by the economic changes caused by the creation of the Panama Canal and the cheapened freight between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts through the canal as contrasted with transportation from the Mississippi Valley by rail to the Pacific coast. The entire Mississippi Valley is entitled to the completion of the Panama Canal, which means the completion of the Mississippi River and every tributary of that river and the ultimate connection of all with the Great Lakes.

I am told that there have been serious economic changes made in the Middle West by the development of the Panama Canal by changes in the current of transportation and cheapening of transportation caused by the building of that canal and water communication from San Francisco to New York. If that is so, the Mississippi Valley is entitled to have its waterway transportation perfected by the artificialization of its rivers, and in this great scheme of preparedness, following the standards of Germany, and embracing not only the creation of military forces but an industrial preparedness, the development of the great Mississippi River and all its tributaries constitute a very essential part.

Mr. President, we must not only increase our military strength but we must increase our industrial strength. The question of preparedness is vital in the consideration of both. The perfection of our transportation system is the great problem upon which the solution of industrial preparedness rests.

There is a difference of opinion as to what the economic changes will be when this war ends. Some insist that the return of the armies to industrial life will mean the return of forces diminished by death and weakened by disability, and that their competitive force will not be as great as it was before the war. Others contend that such disadvantages will be more than balanced by the immediate training and discipline of armies of men, women, and children who during the war have been trained in industrial pursuits, and, added to the workers returning from the ranks, will constitute an industrial force unsurpassed in the history of commercial and manufacturing life.

I believe that the latter will be the condition myself. I believe that they will be so driven by poverty and debt to produce for sale in foreign countries that they will produce more cheaply than ever, and that instead of there being an increase of wages after the war owing to the reduction in the number of the male workers there will be a reduction in wages as the result of the great influx of the women and children workers, and that they will have the stimulus to enormous production, the stimulus of necessity and of want, and that meanwhile this country, driven to a higher wage scale by the manufacture of munitions of war, creating a desire in the employed to divide the profits with their employers, and spreading to all other industrial forces by force of example, we at the end of this war will have a higher wage scale, whilst they will have a lower.

What further advantage have they? They have the advantage of the most perfect transportation system in the world. Their ships are now interned in every harbor ready to sail to-morrow upon the termination of the war and to regain their control over mercantile seas. They have the most perfect domestic transportation system, dovetailing with rail and river, and dovetailing both with ocean steamers, and we shall have to contend not only in our own markets with them, we shall not only have to contend against the competition of foreign goods in our own markets, but we shall have to face competition with them in the markets which we have recently gained in other countries; and we shall therefore need every enlightened economic aid in an adjustment for preparedness. What better economic aid can there be than a perfected system of transportation by rail and river and ocean, and a diminution in the cost of the production of power by the enlarged development of our water-power facilities. Are we to hesitate to enter upon this phase of preparedness simply because military preparedness demands from us a larger sum than we have hitherto paid? I say no.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. In making an appeal for something that must appeal, whether we can see our way to do it now or not, to the judgment of every citizen, a great internal nation-wide development that means relief to the South, relief to the North, relief from monopoly, the building of great industries. Twice I have heard the Senator refer to the fact that in some way as related in time, for in no other way can it be related—related in time to that great work which we ought freely to take upon ourselves—there is some other great burden which he calls preparedness, and which seems to cast a shadow across the pathway of internal development on account of its cost.

The Senator has just described, in a measure, the condition of Europe when this awful strife is over. There may be a difference of opinion as to the industrial menace that will come from a country war stricken and poverty stricken, a humanity partially destroyed. I do not feel so certain about it, for it will take Europe some time to revive her fallen condition. But I should like to ask the Senator, even though he may see in that condition of Europe, which alas will be a mute appeal to the pity of the world, something that will invade our industrial life and require extraordinary effort on our part to meet that industrial crisis, can he see armed hosts spring from the graves of Europe when the war is over as a menace to this Nation? Can he see in the empty treasuries of Europe, already on the verge of bankruptcy and going down from day to day with marvelous rapidity, with millions going into their graves and on crutches, a war menace to this Republic?

It does seem to me that the Senator ought to be able to discriminate between those two, and while we should cheerfully embrace the great expense that is incident to this wonderful national plan of his, a plan that some day, perhaps not in his day or mine, will place his name among the great and enduring names of this country, why with that breadth of grasp and statesmanship should he couple with this great work constantly the suggestion of an unusual, an extraordinary, burden imposed on this country because of the supposed menace of the millions of dead and mangled men of Europe and the bankrupt treasuries of those nations?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am very much in sympathy with the sentiment so eloquently expressed by the Senator from Minnesota regarding a possible exaggeration of the necessity for military preparedness. I admit the force of what he says as to the condition of all the warring forces at the end of the war. But I also realize that if they are prepared for anything it will be for war, through the organization of enormous military forces of unequaled discipline and experience, and that any one of those forces might be utilized with tremendous efficiency even at the close of a war that had brought universal distress and suffering.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator just permit me a moment?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not exaggerate the fact. I indulge in no hysterical emotion regarding military preparedness. What I object to is the inefficiency of our military system as it stands to-day, and I want to see that system perfected. I would want to see it perfected even if the European war did not exist, because I do not like to see anything that rests under the American flag inefficiently organized, and I believe that our national defense has been inefficiently organized. I must reach that conclusion, when I see that with an expenditure of $25,000,000 annually, covering a period of some years, we are able to marshal a force of only about 100,000 men, and when I find that with an expenditure of a similar amount annually during the past five years these great European powers are enabled to assemble a force many times that number and many times more efficient.

I am only for a moderate expenditure. I would prefer to make it only $50,000,000 additional annually for the next five years for that purpose, and simply have a rational preparation for defense, a rational preparation for backing the decrees of the tribunals, both domestic and international, with a force that will inspire respect for those decrees. I do not share at all in the military spirit which seems to be so prevalent and which would make military systems and military sentiments abroad our guide here.

I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. If this interruption has resulted in nothing more than the expression of the Senator's views, I am glad I made the interruption. Of course we should have efficiency, but efficiency does not necessarily involve an expenditure of hundreds of millions more. There has not been a suggestion of efficiency. The suggestion has been a program reaching far into the future, a program that in its fruition could not serve us if we were on the threshold of war to-day. While that program has been made and heralded, practically nothing is done to conserve the resources of a military nature which we do have on hand. Nine great battleships were authorized in the last four years; three of them are, or are about to be, commissioned, and there is scarcely a suggestion of the necessity of hastening the completion of those battleships. If war was immiment to-day, among the things we need would be ordnance, and $12,000,000 for ordnance has been stricken out of the estimates. If we were in danger to-day of war, the one thing that our soldiers would need would be arms and munitions, and not a voice in authority is raised, nor a hand in authority lifted, to prevent the exportation from this country of those arms and munitions that our own soldiers would so much need if there were anything in this cry of impending war.

I heartily agree with the Senator. What we do want is to go on with a reasonable development as heretofore and efficiency with what we have, and the modest estimate of $50,000,000 more might not be out of proportion. But here to-day with these great things appealing to us and demanding attention from us we are met all the time with the statement that we may possibly stand this expense or that expense but grudgingly conceded along with the great added taxation that is proposed to be imposed upon the American people. Let us have efficiency. Let us strengthen our resources. Let us conserve our resources; but when we speak of our resources in view of an impending danger, do not let us neglect the resources that might be conserved to-day, and pile up a mountain of debt that can not end military preparation in its fruition only in years to come, when it could be of no possible service in view of any immediate danger.

I was glad to hear the Senator's statement. I am glad that he states that moderate, temperate view of the situation. We should continue a reasonable development as heretofore. We may well afford to somewhat modify our program. Instead of building so many great battleships we might well build some swift cruisers instead. We might well build supersubmarines and superaeroplanes, but this program has been heralded—it stands like a nightmare with its attendant and incident taxation—a program of great battleships extending far into the future that can have no possible relation to any immediate impending danger. Let us give some heed to our great internal problems; at least let us not ignore them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, my belief is that the Congress of the United States will, with its usual good sense, refuse to surrender to hysteria. In connection with this question of military preparedness I think, of course, that so far as Congress is concerned we are in a great confusion of ideas as to what should be done, and if we could only bring about in our congressional organization regarding legislation relating to the national defense something of the coordination which is proposed to be accomplished by this amendment in relation to our waterways we could have very quickly presented to the people of the United States for their consideration one plan with perhaps a minority plan upon which the attention of the country would be focused. As it is to-day, we have a plan presented by the late Secretary of War, we have another presented by the War College, another presented by the Chief of Staff, another presented by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, another by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, and numerous others presented by distinguished authorities. We are having four committees sitting at the same time upon the question of military preparedness—two House committees, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Committee on Military Affairs, and similar committees in the Senate. I may say five committees, for in the House they have a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, whose jurisdiction extends over fortifications.

And what is the result? Instead of efficiency in the organization of our committees on the national defense we have disorder and confusion. All these committees are holding sessions at the same time, and the experts are passing around from one committee to another giving their views, which are printed in the so-called hearings. The newspapers are unable to keep up with the procession, and, therefore, because of the impossibility of reporting all, they practically report none of the hearings.

I called for the hearings the other day, thinking that I would inform myself upon the subject, and I received a stack from one committee, and was informed that there were similar stacks from all the others. The American people are intent upon the single question of national defense, a unit of which the Army and Navy are simply branches. And yet we have committees sitting on the branches, but never considering the unit or presenting to the American people any complete scheme of national defense.

What would be the rational thing to do, the logical thing to do under these conditions? It would be for the five committees that are engaged in the investigation of this question to create a joint subcommittee consisting of three or five from each, making a subcommittee either of 15 or 25, to have but one hearing as a subcommittee of their various committees. Then let them come in, either with a unanimous report or a majority and minority report, present it to the full committees for their consideration, and to the Congress of the United States, and above all, to the people before they are acted upon, for the Congress of the United States does not create public opinion, it obeys public opinion, and the sources of information ought to be open in some intelligent form to all the people of the United States before we take final action upon this subject.

How easy it would be for such a subcommittee to put to the military and naval authorities this request: Give us a plan for the best Army and Navy that you can secure for $300,000,000 annually for the next five years. Give us a plan for the best Army and Navy, the extent of the forces employed, the various constructions that will have to be made, that will be covered by an expenditure of $350,000,000 annually for the next five years; and from that up if they choose. Then we will have the plans in some form such as is presented by the great engineers of the country of great constructive works, with tables, and so arranged that the ordinary mind can take in all the complexities of the situation and form a judgment.

Instead of that these investigations are adding to the confusion of the hour and perhaps increasing our ignorance of the general subject, and we are all in a state of uncertainty and confusion. The result may be that we will have little satisfaction in our legislation.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would not wonder if as a result we will have an accidental system, a compromise of conflicting views, and containing views without coherence and without scientific adjustment. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the Senator's analysis of that matter has certainly not only interested me, but it has revived memories of efforts that have been made here in the past along that same line. I think, however, the Senator overlooks one important thing. Before we can ever consider the military phase we have got to free ourselves from an influence that is baneful, that has no place in free government, and which interferes with the exercise of the best judgment. I refer to the relation of private greed to the matters of militarism and armament—a subject that was so thoroughly and eloquently taken up by the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] a few days ago, a subject that, in the action of the Senate Naval Committee in finally deciding to report a bill to establish an armor plant, evoked the threat of a great combination that it would penalize the United States in an increased price of armor plate if the Government dared to erect its armor plant. Well may we exclaim, "Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed, that he is grown so great?"

Sir, to my mind, the first and most vital issue of this Republic is for the American people to determine whether this Government shall be supreme or whether it shall be subject to the forces that have grown up under it. To my mind that is more vital than any other issue that to-day presents itself to the American people. The late Senator Dolliver, once upon this floor, speaking of the then arrogant power of privilege, said, "It has grown so bold and defiant that its hand has lost its cunning." It has grown more bold and defiant, until now we hear its threat to penalize this Government if the Government dare to take those steps which its representatives feel are essential to preserve ourselves along military and naval lines. Let us settle that challenge. The first step of this people should be to determine which is supreme in this Republic—the Government of the people or the forces that have grown up under our Government. That done, then I believe the plan of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] is not only wise, but that it is the only plan that will ever result in economy and which will bring order out of chaos.

There is no business in this country that could stand a year if the subordinates in that business, each one, went into the treasury and took out what he thought was necessary for his particular department or bureau. In the conduct of the business of a corporation around a common table there sits a board deciding how much can be expended and how much can be allotted to each particular department. Here we have no such common board, but each department comes through its respective committee, and with no restraint, save the withstanding of the committee as against the appeal of the department, the onslaught is made upon the Treasury. Is it any wonder, then, that a great Senator once said we could save one-third of the expenses of this Government by proper management? That seemed like an exaggeration, but I do not believe it was a very great exaggeration. However, until we adopt the plan outlined by the Senator from Nevada we shall have reckless expenditure, we shall have want of economy, and we shall have chaos where order ought to reign.

I am glad to have been here this morning upon the occasion of the Senator's speech on this subject. I think perhaps that as to much of it the time may not yet have come to put it into legislation, but it is this broad view that in the end is going to result in economy and result in order if we ever adopt one plan or the other. I want to most heartily commend the utterances of the Senator from Nevada upon these subjects.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have taken up a great deal of time, much more time than I had anticipated taking. I wish to state to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], who is so ably presenting the pending bill, that my suggestion of an amendment has no hostile purpose so far as his measure is concerned. Whilst I am not prepared to commit myself with reference to all the details of his bill, and think that doubtless it will be amended in some particulars by the wisdom of the Senate, yet I believe that it is in the right direction; but I believe that it should dovetail in as a part of a great system. For that reason I propose, if I can at this time, to incorporate the great system into the pending bill, so that the pending bill will become a part of it. I have urged that we should commence this great work immediately; that we should not be daunted by the expenditures involved; that they are trivial as compared with the benefits that will be received.

In answer to the suggestions that our military expenditures will require such large additional revenue as to make it impossible to undertake works of this kind, I have to say that I am opposed to any military expenditure that will halt in any way the proper constructive work of the country. So far as I am concerned, if $120,000,000 more of revenue are to be raised, I would be willing to divide that sum between military preparedness and transportation preparedness—$60,000,000 annually going to the great work covered by my amendment and $60,000,000 annually going to increase the efficiency of our military defense. Just as I insist upon methods of coordination, of cooperation, and of efficiency in conducting the great constructive works of the country under this amendment, so I insist upon coordination, cooperation, and efficiency in the preparation for the military defense; but if we will only adopt the methods that will secure these results, we shall be amazed how quickly we can solve the issues that are now presented to us.

There is no reason why we should not ourselves, without the action of these various committees having jurisdiction, provide for the subcommittee to which I refer. There is no reason why we should not insist that we should have a perfected plan of national defense, including both the Army and the Navy as a unit, which would be covered by an expenditure of $300,000,000 or $350,000,000, or any other sum that we name, and there is no reason why we should not within a very short time get definite plans from expert authorities under the direction that we give.

What man, in employing an architect, leaves the question of the cost of his building, of his structure, to the architect? He tells him, in the first place, the area that he wishes his building to cover, the height, the proportions, and then asks for plans. We, however, leave all these questions, without instruction practically, to our experts. The result is that every expert brings in a different plan, involving differing details and differing expenditures, and we are all in confusion. Let us focus the attention of the country, so far as military preparedness is concerned, upon one subcommittee, which will act for all these committees, and let that committee get definite information from the expert authorities as to the structure which it wishes to erect, in the shape of military preparedness, and we shall then have a quick solution of this subject.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I have been required to be out of the Chamber for a time and it may be that the Senator from Nevada has already covered what I am going to ask him about. If he has, however, I shall be glad to have him go over it again. I believe that I agree fully with the suggestions which the Senator makes in reference to the manner in which we should prepare for preparedness, but it seems to me that his amendment is going to reverse that position. I do not think we have any comprehensive survey or plan prepared or estimate submitted upon which to build the structure for which the Senator proposes to appropriate, and it occurred to me that it would be better for the Senator to propose a comprehensive survey that would bring to us estimates as to what could be accomplished and also its cost and then have that submitted to Congress. I think, however, that heretofore I have voted for some proposition of that kind in the way of a commission or something of the sort, which the Senator has proposed. I feel that there is very great merit in the suggestions he makes and in the plan he proposes; but it occurs to me that before we say we are going to appropriate the sum of $600,000,000 we ought to have very detailed surveys and estimates submitted by those who are especially qualified to pass judgment upon such matters. It also occurred to me that it would be better for the Senator to submit something of that kind if we are to vote upon the proposition at all. What would the Senator from Nevada say about that?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have to say with reference to that that we have as to many of our rivers already plans upon which work could be commenced. For instance, we have a perfected plan with reference to the lower Mississippi River from Cairo down as to levee development; we have a perfected plan regarding the Sacramento and the San Joaquin Rivers in California. I believe also that there is a more or less perfected plan with reference to the Columbia River and the Snake River; certainly as to the Columbia River, though possibly thus far not extending to the Snake River. We have also plans for the Ohio, the Cumberland, and the Tennessee.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me there, I wish to say that my understanding of those plans is that they do not take into contemplation what the Senator contemplates in his amendment; they do not take into contemplation what can be done at the headwaters, what can be done in the way of irrigation, or what can be done by way of storage, and so on. For instance, in the Mississippi River those plans contemplate how high we can build the levees or how deep we must get the channels, while, as I understand the Senator's plan, it might do away with all this levee proposition; it might take care of these floods at their source. I have heard him make the remark that he wanted to take the water where it fell and as soon as it fell. If that is true, the plans which we have for the improvement of the lower Mississippi River might not come within his plan at all.

I think there is more force in his other suggestion than there is in his proposition of carrying out the plan that has been proposed, which does not have in view the great coordinate work that he has in contemplation in his plan. Take the Columbia River. All that the plan proposes there is to canalize the channel. It has not taken into account the proposition of the storing of water to be used for power and irrigation purposes. So I think as to practically all our rivers the plans we have had so far submitted may fit to some extent into his plan, but very little; and I should say that if we were to adopt the plans proposed by the Senator, we would want to hold up on those propositions that we have worked out thus far, because we might not include them in his plan, and they might not be necessary at all.

It occurs to me that we are really going contrary to the Senator's plan when we take up this proposed development by piecemeal. There is great merit in the suggestion which the Senator makes; but if we would appropriate $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 for a comprehensive survey, to be completed within a year or two years—not extending it over a long period of time, but appropriating enough money to put a sufficient number of experts with a sufficient force at work to make the comprehensive survey which he desires in a year or two years—then we would have accomplished something and taken a long step toward solving the problem about which the Senator has made, I think, some very valuable suggestions, not only in his speech but in the bill which he has prepared. I myself should like to vote for a proposition of that kind, and I would vote to put it on this bill, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not propose to press this amendment to a vote now. I have simply been pressing it for the consideration of Senators in the hope that they would present suggestions of value that might be used in perfecting this amendment. I simply say, by way of preliminary, that I do not think the plan pointed out by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] will do for this reason: I think it is absolutely essential that we should now commit this country seriously to a work of very large proportions, and that we should name the sum which we propose to apply to it in the bill; and I think we are entirely safe in saying that $600,000,000 will be expended in that work within the next 10 years, for I regard that as a moderate amount rather than a large one.

Now, as to the Senator's suggestion that we should make a survey. Why, that means a survey of all the waters in the United States, the rivers, their tributaries, the creeks, and all the small and large streams which constitute our waterway system. I do not know how many years would be consumed in a study of that kind; but I should be very much afraid that the work might be abandoned almost at any time; that the work would not be kept before the public eye; and that it would end as I have seen other appropriations of this kind end, notably the appropriation for the Missouri River.

Then, in addition to that, I believe that we have enough projects now, which have been well considered and approved, to exhaust the $60,000,000 which we provide for in this bill for the next three years, and I would expect during that time plans to be produced for the enlargement of the work.

Take the lower Mississippi River, to which the Senator refers. He says that the storage and slowing down of the waters above might do away with the necessity of constructing the levees and that the present plans call for the construction of levees at an additional expense, I believe, of about $63,000,000. I believe that levee work should continue under whatever plan we adopt, because I do not believe we ought to surrender that vast area there to crocodiles, and I believe if we stop that levee work in the expectation hereafter of forming plans that will obstruct the flow of the water above, that that entire area will go back to a state of practical unproduction. So I would go on with those expenditures.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. The Senator did not understand me as being in favor of that?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I did not; but the Senator suggested that the levee work might be suspended or that it might not be necessary to raise the levees to the height now contemplated. I believe that it will be necessary to raise the levees to the height contemplated. What I want to save is an expansion of the height of the levees in the future, for I am satisfied that, under existing conditions, the present height contemplated for those levees will not be sufficient. Just to the extent that we reclaim the swamp lands above and deprive the overflow waters of the areas over which they have been accustomed to spread, to that extent we will increase the pressure on the funnel below, and New Orleans is right at the neck of that funnel.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I understood from the argument which he has been making, that by the storage of the waters above and holding them back, we would do away with the great floods down below.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; we will never do away with them; we may simply mitigate them.

Mr. JONES. I do not mean to suggest that we should not do whatever levee work may be necessary; but the Senator provides in his bill for surveys and for examinations, and he has been arguing that his bill is a broad and comprehensive one. Now, I do not see how we can secure a broad and comprehensive system without first having the foundation laid in a broad and comprehensive survey.

The Senator allots $50,000,000 for the 10 years, for instance, to the Northwestern States, Washington and Oregon and possibly a part of Idaho—I have not the map before me—but how are we going to start to expend that money? Should we not have some plan devised under which we will expend it? We may not need that much money, although, as the Senator suggests, we will probably need more, and I am willing to concede that is so; but if we start out in a piecemeal way, expending a little bit here, a little bit there, and a little bit yonder, under some plan that may have been prepared, without taking into view the comprehensive system which the Senator proposes, we will get back into even a worse system than we have now, and we will, under a plan that ought to work out in the most economical way, waste more money than we have been wasting in the past.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator will find that 15 or 20 scientific services, such as the Engineer Corps of the Army, the Reclamation Service, the Forestry Service, the Drainage Service, and other services, have, as the result of exhaustive study in the past, plans under consideration which involve large expenditures of money. The purpose of this bill is to bring them together in one body, so that they will coordinate and so as to make their plans and their work dovetail. I have not the slightest doubt that, if you bring all these scientific services into conference to-day, within six months, out of the information which they have already obtained, out of the surveys which they have made, out of the plans and estimates which they have prepared, they will elaborate plans for large and efficient expenditures of money under this bill. As this work of investigation has been going on by each one of these scientific services in the past 15 or 20 years, each one of them presenting its claims upon Congress for appropriations, I assume that, when you get them together with a view to dovetailing their plans and making a common plan, they can accomplish their work very much more quickly than if they had not existed in the past and had not gone through this period of exhaustive research and work.

So I would object to the suggestion of the Senator as involving simply years of investigation regarding matters that have already been investigated by competent scientific bodies, and which only require cooperation and coordination to perfect, so that they will make a complete system. For instance, whilst I believe that on the Columbia and Snake Rivers, to which the Senator alludes, the Army engineers have prepared plans relating only to channel improvement, the Reclamation Service has also made surveys relating to arid-land reclamation and water-power development, and the system which I propose will involve the coordination of these two great engineering services in dovetailing existing plans and contemplated works.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator that, so far as plans have been prepared by the various branches of the Government service, it would require no great amount of time, except the coordination of those plans. The Senator is about the only one whom I now recall who has given much effort toward the adoption of this general plan. One can find now and then through the country men who appreciate it, but before any great movement can be inaugurated there would have to be a momentum and a force put behind it.

The very fact of an appropriation being made with a view of utilizing what would have to be utilized, of developing what would have to be developed under this general plan, would be the means, it seems to me, of bringing it to the attention of the public as it never has been brought before, awakening an interest in the different sections as it never has been awakened before; and, while at first blush it might seem like postponing the matter, I believe in the long run that time would be gained by adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Washington. To-day if you broach this matter, the answer is, "Why, we do not know anything about it; there is no general plan; we have no figures or anything else regarding it." It is true that in the various offices of the Government, to which the Senator from Nevada has referred, there are a good many figures; there is a great deal of data that could be used; but it has not gone before the public in any concrete form, except so far as the Senator has been able, very largely by his own efforts, to get it there. While the Senator is not called upon at this moment to decide the matter, it strikes me that it is worth considering as to whether the plan suggested by the Senator from Washington would not in the end be conducive to expedition.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, upon a subsequent day I will present proofs that this plan already has the approval of public opinion in the shape of legislative indorsements, indorsements by waterway conventions and associations, chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and individual letters. I will also show that this plan has been in contemplation ever since Mr. Roosevelt's administration and that they had Mr. Roosevelt's approval whilst he was President. I can show numerous letters addressed to me upon the subject, showing his interest in it, his anxiety regarding it, and his desire that this plan should be pushed. I can also show the report of the Inland Waterways Commission, composed, as I have said, originally of two Senators and two Representatives, the two Representatives later entering the Senate, and also of the chiefs of the various scientific services, in which every essential feature of this bill is presented and indorsed, and that among those names appears the name of Mr. Burton. I regret to say that Mr. Burton has not since identified himself with any idea of constructive work in this direction. Mr. Burton's attitude has been mainly one of criticism and of cynicism with reference to river development; but there was the action of that commission, signed by Mr. Burton himself, who at that time indorsed the principles of this bill.

The bill has been presented at every session since, and I think that the public is much better informed regarding this question than the Senator from Minnesota is disposed to think, and that public judgment is as fully made up upon this question of broad and comprehensive work as it is upon any other question. I will give an illustration. The other day, just before the session of Congress began, I received a telegram from the governor of Kansas—a Republican, with whom I am in no political relations—stating that they had had a very destructive flood in that State, that their attention had been called to the bill which I had been urging, and requesting me to stop at Topeka in order to confer with the leading citizens of that State regarding it. I did so, and I found assembled at the governor's office about 100 of the leading men in the State, regardless of party—men of large enterprise, managers of railways, mayors of cities, and men of affairs generally. I found that they had been considering the bill carefully. The result of our deliberations was that they unanimously indorsed it, and the governor told me that the State of Kansas is behind this amendment. He told me that a request would be made of their Senators and their Members of Congress to support it.

Later on there was a luncheon at the Commercial Club, and there the matter was discussed. It was thoroughly understood, very intelligently considered, and a unanimous vote of approval given to this measure. In New Orleans itself, the leading newspaper of that city has been agitating and urging this plan for years, and the Louisiana Legislature has indorsed it; the State of Wisconsin has indorsed it, the State of South Dakota, and

I think the State of California, though I am not sure. At all events, about eight or more States have indorsed this amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. There is a bill known as the Ransdell bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. How does that differ from the Senator's bill, or is it substantially the same?

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I understand, the Ransdell bill simply takes hold of the Mississippi River below Cairo and deals with that. The Senator from Louisiana is fearful of including that development in a great bill lest in the delay consequent upon the consideration of a great bill that enterprise may temporarily suffer, and he feels the absolute necessity of continuous work.

Mr. KENYON. What is the status of that bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That bill, as I understand, provides for carrying out quickly the plans of the Mississippi River Commission, which is composed partly of engineers of the Army and partly of civilians. It is a commissions that has the confidence of that region, and it has been engaged in cooperative work with the various States under a system by which the Government contributes a certain proportion toward the construction of these levees and the various levee districts contribute another proportion. Those levee districts, I am told, are, many of them, in a condition of embarrassment and of bankruptcy.

Mr. KENYON. Is that bill now before the Senate?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I believe it is. I do not know whether it is before the Senate or not, but——

Mr. KENYON. Is it on the calendar?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know. I do not think it is; but it is being urged by the Senator from Louisiana. His position is this: He does not object to a big bill, but he is fearful that so much time will be lost in the consideration of a big bill that the work down there may temporarily suffer.

Let me say another thing: This amendment really makes that Mississippi River Commission, in which the Senator from Louisiana has so much confidence, one of the instrumentalities through which the work is to be done. The amendment does not seek to disturb any of the existing jurisdictions or any of the existing operations of these various scientific bureaus and commissions, but simply to bring them into harmony for cooperative work.

Mr. KENYON. Let me ask the Senator another question. If the Senator's bill should be passed, would that eliminate the necessity, if there be any kind of a necessity, for the passage of the bill of the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NEWLANDS. In my judgment it would.

Mr. KENYON. That is to say, it would cover the same subjects that are covered by the bill of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Absolutely.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is it in contemplation, in the event of this great enterprise of the Senator's becoming law, to eliminate the annual river and harbor bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No. My idea is that the harbor bill would progress, but that the moneys for the rivers would be appropriated by this measure. As I understand, the bulk of the appropriations heretofore made in the river and harbor bill have been for the harbors.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would that take care of the creeks as well?

Mr. NEWLANDS. What bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. The comprehensive bill of the Senator from Nevada. Would that eliminate legislation for the creeks and other small waterways of the country that we constantly find in the river and harbor bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It would take care of all creeks that would properly form a part of an intelligent and scientific system.

Mr. KENYON. The creeks that have any water in them.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, can he tell approximately how much the Government has expended up to date on the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I can not. I think about $600,000,000 has been expended by the Government on rivers and harbors. I do not know what proportion of it has been expended on those rivers.

Mr. GALLINGER. One hundred million dollars, probably, on those two great rivers?

Mr. NEWLANDS. On the whole Mississippi River? I should say so.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. KENYON. May I suggest that in the debate on the river and harbor bill it was disclosed that over $140,000,000 had been spent on the Mississippi River.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. Can the Senator give us any good reason, any substantial reason, that would tend to clarify our minds and vision, when we come to the consideration of this subject, as to how it is that after having spent $140,000,000 on the Mississippi River there is not any commerce on that river?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I tried to explain that in my remarks when the Senator from New Hampshire was not present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am sorry I was not present.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But I shall be glad to give the Senator an epitome of what I said on that subject.

The Senator's inquiry is as to how, logically, we can consider the expenditure of more money on the Mississippi River when the expenditure of $140,000,000 has done very little toward the promotion of navigation on that river. My answer is that that expenditure has been scattered most ineffectively over a great number of years; that the expenditure did not involve the comprehensive treatment of the entire river with a view to making it an instrumentality of commerce; that the work was done largely in detached places here and there, in the removal of sand bars and other obstructions or in the construction of levees, and so forth; but that there never has been an effort really to artificialize and perfect the Mississippi River as an instrumentality of commerce. That involves the establishment of transfer facilities and sites, the dovetailing of the river with the rails by a system of legislation and administration, the construction of the proper wharves, the erection of the proper stations and warehouses, and so forth. The river has thus far been developed practically as a railroad would be developed across the continent, with spaces, every mile or two, of rails left out, or without stations or side tracks. The Senator can understand how effective a railroad would be upon which a very considerable amount of money had been expended that was in that condition; and that has been practically the condition of the Mississippi River.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, the method of building dikes along the Mississippi River, as I have observed, has been, as a rule, to build them only on one side of the river; and that has resulted in many cases in forcing the water to the other side and doing great damage to private property. As I understand, there are millions of dollars of claims filed against the Government now by parties who say that the Government improvement has resulted in destroying their property, and that the Government ought to be held responsible for it.

To take care of the waters of the Mississippi River permanently, would it not be necessary to dike the river on both sides to a very large extent, covering a large area? And if that is necessary, and then the Senator has constructed the terminals and various other things that he has enumerated as being necessary, does he think the $600,000,000 to which he has referred will much more than meet the requirements of the Mississippi River alone?

Mr. NEWLANDS. My answer to that is that the estimate of the engineers is that $63,000,000 will put the levees of the Mississippi River, from Cairo down, in a condition to withstand the invasion of the floods.

Mr. GALLINGER. To build levees on both sides?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; to build all the levees that are necessary. It may not be necessary, of course, where there is a steep bank, to construct a levee, so that you would not necessarily have to have continuous levees on both sides of the river. Undoubtedly, as the Senator says, the construction of levees in some places has forced the water unduly upon other places and inflicted injury from which damage has resulted. I should, however, expect a capable board of engineers to construct these levees so as to avoid that difficulty as far as practicable; although, of course, there may be cases where such an injury is a necessary evil and must be paid for.

Mr. GALLINGER. If I have read the Senator's amendment correctly—and I have read it only casually—I think the Senator has in his mind a scheme, which to some extent is expressed in the amendment, of a very large expenditure in addition to the mere diking of the river. I will ask the Senator if that is not true?

Mr. NEWLANDS. In that particular place?

Mr. GALLINGER. Anywhere where there is water.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, this scheme involves an expenditure of $60,000,000 annually on all the rivers of the United States for a period of 10 years, $600,000,000 in all. I was stating, before the Senator came in, that it is stated by Mr. Hill that there will probably be a necessary expenditure of $5,000,000,000 during the next five years on the railways of the country; and I was contrasting that with the very moderate sum that is requested for the waterways, the latter development, in my judgment, being as essential as the former.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but of course the Government does not furnish the money for the development of the railways of the country.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The one is in the hands of quasi public corporations, which collect rates from the public.

Mr. GALLINGER. But what I was desirous of getting information about was as to whether the Senator's scheme does not contemplate terminals——

Mr. NEWLANDS. It does.

Mr. GALLINGER. And various other matters that will greatly add to the $63,000,000 that he says the Mississippi River Commission has suggested as being enough to take care of the Mississippi River from Cairo down.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should say that probably some expenditure would be required in that direction. I should, however, expect this commission as far as possible to accomplish that work by cooperation with the States, for which this amendment provides; but I do think, even if the States are not able to contribute, or are unwilling to contribute, that the use of the Mississippi River as a great national highway would warrant the Government in providing these transfer facilities, just as if it were constructing a Government railway it would provide station houses and sidetracks.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator a further question. There is a railroad on each side of the Mississippi River, on the bank on each side; is there not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think that it ever will be possible to have successful competition on the Mississippi River as against the railways?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think so, if you will provide a sufficient length of river over which the boats can operate. This plan involves, ultimately, the complete navigation of the lower Mississippi River, the Ohio, the upper Mississippi River, and the Missouri, and some of their tributary streams, so that in that way there will be a larger area over which the boats can transact business. Then, in addition to that, I should hope there would be greater cooperation between the rails and the rivers, the rails hauling the more costly goods, and the rivers hauling the goods of large bulk and low cost.

Mr. GALLINGER. In other words, adopting the German system, so far as that is concerned?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. But—and just there I regret that I did not hear the Senator's entire speech; I was unavoidably kept out of the Chamber—the Senator compares the scheme he has in mind or its results with the development in Europe.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator knows—and he knows much more about that matter than I do—that the German canals were built long ahead of any railroads in Germany, and that that system was developed as a necessity for transportation before railroads were thought of. Does the Senator think that with this great system of railroads that we have, expanding every year—unfortunately, it has not expanded much during the last year for some reason or other—that we can go into a system of canal and river development that will enable us to perfect a system that will be at all comparable to that of Germany?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think it would be entirely practicable, and I think it would be advisable, for this reason: It is true, as the Senator says, that the canalization of the German rivers preceded the construction of their railways, and their waterways then constituted practically their only perfected system of transportation; and the Senator argues from that that if the railway construction had come first it would not be necessary to develop the waterways, and that they would not be developed. My answer to that is that if that were the case the Germans would stop now the further development of their rivers; but, on the contrary, they are developing them more highly than ever, as I understand, and making very large expenditures upon them, and are not only canalizing the rivers themselves but are connecting them by canals; so that they seem to rely there upon the waterways as a necessary part of a cheap transportation system.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senator longer. I thank him for permitting me to ask the questions I have asked him. I have not given much thought to this great scheme of the Senator's. I confess that I thought it was Utopian, and I have not entirely gotten that idea out of my mind yet. But as long as I chance to be here, associated with the distinguished Senator from Nevada, I am going to follow the development of his scheme with a great deal of interest. If it works out, as the Senator thinks it will, to the advantage of the American people, to the development of a transportation system much more desirable than we have at the present time, I will join the Senator from Minnesota in saying that the Senator from Nevada will have earned the gratitude of the country, and some time we will erect a monument to his memory.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator is very kind in his expressions, and I hope that at all events we will all unite in erecting a monument to American intelligence and American efficiency in this great system. But I want, in a very good-natured way, to bring back to the Senator's memory a little matter of legislative history which I think ought to insure his sympathetic interest in this bill. That is that when the Senator from New Hampshire, with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], was very intent upon passing the bill for the acquisition of lands in the Appalachian Mountains and the White Mountains, which had been denuded of their forests, upon the assumption that those lands contributed in some way to the supply of rivers, and thus affected navigation and interstate commerce, I was then desirous of tacking my river-regulation bill as an amendment onto that bill; and there was some apprehension, I think, regarding it upon the part of those who were interested in that bill.

I wish to say that that bill was a very wise measure, in my judgment, and it had my entire sympathy; and at that time I thought it was a favorable opportunity, when a detached part of the water question was coming up, to put on as an amendment a general scheme of legislation. I forebore doing this at the urgent request of the Senators interested in the Appalachian bill, and my recollection is that the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Connecticut, in return, indicated that when the opportunity offered they would be inclined to view with a good deal of hospitality the general legislation that I had in contemplation, and I have always relied upon their hearty cooperation in perfecting such a measure, just as I gave mine to the perfection of the measure which the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Connecticut were backing.

Mr. GALLINGER. Doubtless we did flatter the Senator a little on that occasion, because we wanted his support. I have no doubt of that; but there never was a moment when I did not believe that the $7,000,000 that we got for the Appalachian and White Mountain Forest Reservation scheme would be lost in the shuffle if we added a $600,000,000 proposition to the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes. But, Mr. President, the Senator could only logically support the measure that he was then supporting upon the assumption that those lands would ultimately be used as a part of a great and connected scheme of navigation; for certainly if our rivers are not to be used for navigation and are not to be used for interstate commerce, it was an unwise thing for the National Government to expend $7,000,000 for lands which could not be utilized in any way under any national power.

This bill simply provides a method under which all these various organizations, including the commission which the Senator had organized under the Appalachian and White Mountains bill, can be brought into teamwork for the development of a great and comprehensive and efficient system of developed waterways.

I believe the purchase that was then made was a wise one. I am told that additional appropriations are now being sought for that land-purchasing commission; but one of the criticisms I have to make of that entire system is that we are constantly legislating and constantly appropriating for detached portions of a waterway system without really organizing a waterway system in its completeness at all and without taking any steps to establish a complete waterway system. The lands acquired in this way will fit into a waterway system. They are utterly useless for purposes of interstate commerce or of navigation unless a waterway system is perfected; and I trust that the encouragement which the Senator gave me at that time for support of this measure will be realized.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to get his view on a proposition that I think is directly connected with this bill, and that is the proposition of retarding the flow of the streams that go into the Mississippi; for instance, so that the waters may be put to other uses and not do damage at the lower end of the Mississippi, where they are not wanted.

I have often thought—and I have given the matter some study—that in the various reclamation schemes that have been developed, some of which have been put into operation in the West, where the water has been held back in reservoirs and used for irrigation purposes, instead of charging up to the reclamation fund the cost of the dams by which the water is held back it ought to be paid out of the general fund, the same as appropriations in the river and harbor bill are paid out of the general fund, because it results in preventing water from doing damage, although the water itself is used for beneficial purposes. But I confess I was somewhat disappointed by some articles I have read on the subject by some of our experts, who claim that the amount of water that we would prevent from going down the Mississippi by means of dams of that kind would be so small that they would not notice it.

I should like to ask the Senator if he has given to that subject the consideration that I think it deserves in connection with the very interesting plan he has outlined. Has the Senator any idea as to how much benefit we get in the way of prevention of floods in the lower Mississippi by the retention of the waters for irrigation purposes near their sources?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is very difficult to state it with any mathematical exactness. My contention is that every device should be used to slow up the progress of the waters from the mountains and hills and plains upon which they fall down toward the Gulf and the ocean, and that just to that extent you diminish the height of the flood at the points of danger. There will not only be these diversions for reclamation, but there will be diversions for water power, for intensive cultivation, and there will also be the increased storage of moisture in the forests, and there will also be, probably, systems of agricultural development under which the ordinary field will be enabled to absorb more of the current fall of water and give it out to the small streams more slowly, and the general operation of all of these retarding processes will be to reduce very materially the volume of water that is to be thrown against a particular place of danger below. I can not with any mathematical accuracy say how much that will amount to; but the Senator can see how many devices can be multiplied in that direction and how, in doing that, we can increase the beneficial use of water. I should hope to see, for instance, vast areas of arid and semi-arid land that now have no water absorb these waters.

Mr. NORRIS. It has seemed to me always that we ought to differentiate between building a dam for the sole purpose and object of preventing the water from going farther down and the building of a dam which would have the same effect, but which provides for the use of water where it is kept. The plan under the present law is that the expense of building a dam, for instance, for irrigation must be paid by the people who use the water on their land. It would be right, in my judgment, if they should be made to pay a part of it; but if the water that we keep back materially decreases the danger below, and we feel bound to prevent damage below by a general appropriation, it would be only fair, it seems to me, that the expense of keeping back such water should be divided between the people who use the water and get a specific use of it and the general public that has been saved the expense of taking care of the water where it is a danger.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I quite agree with the Senator. He has made a perfect demonstration of the justice of such an apportionment, and I expect that to be done under this amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. There could be no doubt if such a very great amount of water is kept back in, let us say, for illustration, the Pathfinders Dam in Wyoming, at a time when it would do harm if permitted to go on down the river, it not only saves the people from expending money and saves it from doing damage farther down, but by putting it on the land, seeping through the land at a later season of the year when it is dry, it gets back into the river and thus helps to make the river navigable at a season of the year when it would otherwise be dry.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say to the Senator that I think he has very clearly stated the principles that should govern, and that this amendment provides for an apportionment of costs and benefits as between the National Government and those who are operating perhaps under State laws, the State government, or purely private interests. The Senator is quite correct in saying that every gallon of water which is held back by an irrigation enterprise to that extent helps navigation below if it tends to keep that gallon of water from adding to an existing flood.

Mr. NORRIS. And lets it out at the time when it is needed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As well as adding to the river when it is attenuated.

Mr. NORRIS. That brings me to the other part of the Senator's plan. In the case we were holding back waters, let us say, to illustrate, in the State of Ohio, emptying into the Ohio River and then into the Mississippi, it would not be possible, at least as I understand it, for us to put those waters to beneficial purposes. In fact, I presume it would flood the ground, and there we would have to pay damages. Instead of being a benefit in the immediate community, it might be a damage. There might an entirely different question arise there from what would arise in the West, where we would use the water for irrigating purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can understand, of course, that the construction of a great reservoir in the humid region might involve some possible injury to adjoining lands, and in that case compensation would have to be made.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it in the Senator's mind that his plan would mean the building of dams through Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and Iowa, for instance, for the purpose of holding back the water?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would expect the commission to do the most businesslike thing. If it is wise for the Government to do so, in aid of navigation and to actually own and control it or lease the power, I would expect them to do that. If it could by some beneficial arrangement with a private corporation give it the power to construct a dam and create reservoirs for water-power development under proper conditions of control in the public interest, then I would expect them to do that. The powers of this amendment are ample to do either.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the powers are quite general, and as the Senator says they are ample, but at the same time it seems to me when we are called upon to pass on its we ought to be able to look it over and see, at least, approximately what the authorities provided in the bill could do under existing conditions. Suppose we were going to build dams through Ohio and Indiana where the land that would be overflowed is very valuable. The power that could be developed with flood waters there would be only a temporary affair unless we developed vast storage capacity to hold the water. There again we come into a condition that is entirely different from the West.

Let us take the Pathfinders Dam, to illustrate. There the water is dammed up in the river somewhere between 250 and 300 feet deep, running back 15 or 20 miles, covering a vast area of country, but there were no damages in flooding that, because it is a mountainous country, with rocks and among the hills, and the land is of no earthly value for agricultural purposes. They hold back enough water there and they hold back the flood waters. Those are the waters that they keep. They have to let go enough to keep the stream going as it would be in ordinary times, and they keep only the surplus water in the dam. It is possible there because, as I said, the only expense connected with it is to build the dam; but if you are going to undertake to do that in Ohio or some old settled part of the country, or in Iowa, in an agricultural community, the Senator can see that the damage we would have to pay would be something enormous.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would not expect the commission to enter upon the construction of any dam that requires so large an expenditure for the dam site, and also for the area covered by the overflow, as to more than offset the benefits arising.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, there comes the difficulty, as I see it, in that part of the Senator's plan. Would you not have to do that in effect on the lower Mississippi River in holding back the water? You have to put the water in a dam if you hold it back.

Mr. NEWLANDS. In that case, of course, they would consider as to whether it was just to warrant a large expenditure; but I would not expect them to do a foolish thing. The Senator knows that many places are mountainous, and probably these reservoirs can be established on land which is of very little value. Then, in the Mississippi Valley region there are the mountain tributaries of the Ohio, for instance.

Mr. NORRIS. You would not find many such places in the State of Ohio.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; not in the State of Ohio. But in the State of West Virginia, for instance, or the western part of Pennsylvania and at the headwaters of the Tennessee, which, I believe, are in Alabama and North Carolina.

Mr. NORRIS. You might find them there.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would imagine that the land there is almost valueless in many places. Of course I can understand that there are locations where a dam would be a very expensive luxury because of the large area of cultivated land that would be necessary in order to hold the water.

Mr. NORRIS. I think most of the dams built in Ohio and Indiana and such localities would be small dams up the river or stream a very short distance, so that there would not be very great damages as far as flooding the country is concerned, but while under the regular flow of the stream they might develop power, at the same time it would have no influence whatever over the damages that might occur farther down in the Mississippi Valley, because it would not hold the water back except to fill up the space behind the dam, and that would have to be done only once.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can understand, of course, in such cases the dam construction would be very expensive.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator another question about his proposed amendment, and I think it is quite an important one, upon which the Senator I think so far has not gone into any detail. He provides for cooperation between the municipalities and States. I wish the Senator would explain just what he means, what he thinks could be accomplished in that respect. How could they cooperate with the States?

Mr. NEWLANDS. For instance, with reference to municipalities, we will assume there is a town on the Mississippi River that has at present no proper transfer facilities, even if the river were navigated by boats, and it is necessary to construct wharves and warehouses and other structures that relate to the transportation business. It will be necessary perhaps to construct a retaining wall at considerable cost to fill in, and other things of that kind. I would expect that this commission would enter into a businesslike arrangement with that municipality and endeavor, if possible, to have the entire expenditure made by the municipality; and if the municipality is unable, to share in some fair proportion that expense. The idea is to make these rivers great national water highways, just as a railway is constructed, with all the proper transfer facilities and sidetracks and conveniences of transportation. Then a cooperating plan, I imagine, could be suggested and gradually perfected with the municipalities providing for a sharing of the expenditure, or perhaps the assumption of the whole by the Federal Government if the municipality would not be justified in entering into it.

There is now cooperation between the Mississippi River Commission and the various levee commissions of Mississippi and Louisiana and of other States. We make an annual appropriation, I think, of about $3,000,000 for levee construction. The Mississippi River Commission, consisting largely of Engineer officers of the Army and also of men who are skilled in that kind of engineering, civilians, administer that fund. The examination that I made demonstrated that they were making very businesslike arrangements with the proprietors of land, or rather with the levee commissions, who represented the land and who had the power of local assessment and taxation for benefits.

It seemed to me from what I saw of the situation that this national commission was exacting from the private owners and from the States as their representative a very full proportion of the cost. In some cases I imagine it has amounted to a hardship, because I am told that some of those levee commissions are in practical bankruptcy owing to the extraordinary expenditures they have been put to by reason of floods. That discretionary power has been given and it has been exercised wisely. I would have that extend to the entire area of the operations of this National Waterways Commission, so that they could cooperate with the States and municipalities and corporations and individuals and could apportion the cost and the benefits fairly according to the conditions and circumstances.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me ask the Senator another question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the object or the main object of the constitutional peg on which the Senator would hang the legislation would be to improve navigation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator think that included in that there ought to be some prevention of such things as have happened in the past? The Senator himself mentioned in the admirable address to which we have listened, that railroads would not be able to put a man with a boat out of business. There ought to be a regulation similar, perhaps, to what they have in Germany and France, so that when the rivers are developed for navigation purposes men who build boats and do business on the rivers would have the assurance that they would not be run out of business by the railroads.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would welcome an amendment to my amendment which would further that purpose. The committee of which I am chairman—the Interstate Commerce Committee—has now certain bills before it intended to enforce a fair treatment of the water carriers by the rail carriers, and I have no doubt that, even if we do not include such legislation in this bill, it will be the subject of consideration by the Interstate Commerce Committees of both Houses. I will state that such legislation is in contemplation by the subcommittee on transportation, recently authorized by the Senate in a resolution now pending in the House.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would be interesting if the Senator could give us an outline of the method which has been pursued in the past in Germany and France, for instance, where they have developed such a wonderful commerce on their rivers. What course have they taken to prevent railroads, for example, from reducing the rate below cost when navigation is opened and then putting it up high when navigation is closed—when they have driven the boats off the stream?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know exactly what form their legislation has taken, but I understand the legislation is complete upon that subject and that the waterways are guarded by the legislation of both Germany and France.

Mr. SMOOT. The rates are made by the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I was simply going to say, Mr. President, that in Germany the water rates and also the railroad rates are made by the Government. The Government provides that the water rates at no time shall be more than a certain per cent less than the railroad rates. Of course, if we had the same power the German Government has in compelling railroads to observe rates, we could do the same that they do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think the Senator from Nebraska must have some conception by this time of the length and breadth of the interstate-commerce power.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I should like to ask another question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The suggestion made by the Senator from Utah agrees with the little information I have on the subject, and that is that in Germany, for instance, they have a law which provides that railroads must charge a certain per cent above the water rates. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if that is true?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks the attention of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I beg pardon.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it true that in Germany they have a law which provides that the railroad rate must be a certain per cent higher than the water rate? Do they have a law that prohibits a railroad company, for instance, from making a rate that is lower?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not make any accurate statement upon that subject. Some years ago my attention was called to the subject and I looked into it, but I can not recall just what the nature of the legislation is. However, I do know that they preserve the equilibrium there.

Mr. NORRIS. As has been very well suggested by the Senator from Utah, in Germany the Government owns the railroads and can do that. It is my understanding that it was necessary, even though the Government did own many railroads, to pass a law to prohibit the Government-owned railroads from cutting under the rates on rivers. In France the Government does not own the railroads.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Government does not own all the railroads in France.

Mr. NORRIS. There is a regulation there.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is an equilibrium preserved.

Mr. NORRIS. In what way is it preserved there?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I could not state to the Senator what the exact form of the legislation is.

Mr. NORRIS. It occurred to me when the Senator was speaking on his proposed amendment in regard to having railroad rates and transportation on the river correspond and dovetail that it possibly had a tendency to lead toward the Government ownership of railroads.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, it may.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator, if his joint resolution which passed the Senate the other day becomes a law and the joint committee is appointed and will take a trip to Europe, as it probably will, that they give special attention to that particular subject in connection with the so-called Borah amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator that if they take a trip to Europe I think the appropriation will have to be enlarged.

Mr. NORRIS. It would probably have to be extended unless the war closes. We could not run the risk of having Senators and Representatives go over there now, for fear that they would be held as hostages.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I want to say one thing about competition between rail and water. There is no doubt that in the past the railroads have been very potential in the creation of a public opinion, or rather in blocking public opinion, regarding the development of our waterways. They have been a discouraging influence everywhere. I think, however, that the railways now are beginning to realize that a large part of their transportation of bulky articles is comparatively noncompensatory, and as the density of traffic increases upon all the railroads you will find that there will be a disposition to confine them more to the carriage of goods of considerable price that will bear higher rates of transportation.

In the past railroad building has been in advance of the requirements of the country, and the result has been that they have been compelled to reach out for every kind of transportation, and they were naturally solicitous to absorb all the transportation that was being conducted upon the rivers and lakes and the coasts. Now, I think that the necessity for that is not so great and that they are also beginning to realize that the development of a complete system of transportation will tend to increase the density of the population. For instance, suppose we could have that entire flooded region, that swamp region from Cairo down to the Gulf, the richest region in the world possibly, capable of indefinite multiplication of production, capable of supplying the wants of a dense population such as Holland has, you can see that river improvement and navigation might tend to a very large increase in the transportation of freight by water. Yet there would be a very much larger increase of transportation by rail, and the railways will thus benefit by the development and increase in the population of the surrounding country caused by a thoroughly perfected system of transportation which will involve rail and river and ocean.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is it not a fact, I will ask the Senator, that instead of Germany having a law which provides that the railroads shall not charge more than the water carriers, Germany divides the freight, giving the heavy, bulky freight, the raw materials, to the steamboats and the higher-cost freight to the railroads, and in that way there is actually no competition. But, of course, I presume the Government holds its hand on both of them to see that they do not exact an inordinate rate of transportation.

I will ask the Senator, furthermore, because it is worthy of consideration, whether his investigations have carried him into the field of comparative transportation rates as between this country and European countries. In other words, is it not a fact that the railroads of this country are to-day transporting freight at a less cost per mile than the railroads of Europe? Has the Senator gone into that at all?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I believe that to be the case myself.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator believes it to be the case?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think we have the most perfect system of railways in the world, and I think we have, on the whole, the cheapest transportation.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is, I think, sustained by statistics.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think, however, our railroads have developed the transportation in bulk beyond any railway system in the world. Long trains, big cars, tremendous locomotives, and the reduction of grades have all tended to this result. But that does not minimize at all my view of the question that the waterways of the country should be developed not only for navigation but for all the other incidental uses, and that in the end the railways themselves will be benefited by it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree to that. In connection with the observation the Senator has just made that our railroad system has been developed to a much higher point than that of European countries, I recall the fact that I inquired in Germany how it happened that it had those little dinky engines that we would hardly tolerate on a country road in the United States, and the reply was that the Government would not permit them to use the large engines because they wanted the heavy freight to be carried by the waterways. Beyond a question our railroad system in this country is so superior to that of the European countries that there is no comparison between them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That has been my experience and observation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. It has been suggested by the Senator from Nebraska that if the storm waters were stored, for example, in Iowa or Illinois or other of the Western States, the water could not be used for any purpose, as it might be in those Western States, where irrigation is necessary. I should suppose that if this plan were carried out the dams would not be constructed in actually navigable streams, but in the smaller streams that feed the navigable streams. Has the Senator considered to what extent the stored waters during times of storm might be used in times of low water by being released and thereby regulating and increasing the flow of water during a dry season?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think that is a very valuable factor in the development of a river, in making a suitable stream.

Mr. WORKS. It seems so to me.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is just as important that we should avoid a thin and attenuated flow of the river as it is high floods. We should maintain, as far as possible, a standard flow of the river, so as to carry boats of standard draft.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I think it is quite understood by those who have followed the course of the debate thus far that the bill before us contemplates the transfer from the Secretary of the Interior to the Secretary of War of jurisdiction over the disposition of public lands that may be of very great value and importance. I say it transfers jurisdiction because the case is not one that is not already provided for by law.

Statutes have been enacted contemplating the disposition of just such lands as are affected by the provision of the bill under debate to which the amendment which I have offered is directed. The lands that are affected by the provisions of my amendment are those which will be flooded by the water backed up by the construction of the dam in a navigable stream; that is to say, in the first place, the provision contemplates lands which would be, or be a part of, a reservoir site. It is proposed to modify the existing law with reference to those lands. It is accordingly desirable that the provisions of the bill should be considered with reference to the law as it is to-day.

An act was passed in 1891, which applied only to irrigation projects, but by a subsequent statute was made applicable to lands which should be desired for reservoir sites to be used in the development of hydroelectric power. The act of 1891, in sections 18 and 19, provided as follows:

SEC. 18. That the right of way through the public lands and reservations of the United States is hereby granted to any canal or ditch company formed for the purpose of irrigation and duly organized under the laws of any State or Territory, which shall have filed, or may hereafter file, with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of its articles of incorporation, and due proofs of its organization under the same, to the extent of the ground occupied by the water of the reservoir and of the canal and its laterals, and 50 feet on each side of the marginal limits thereof; also the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of the canal or ditch material, earth, and stone necessary for the construction of such canal or ditch.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 19. That any canal or ditch company desiring to secure the benefits of this act shall, within 12 months after the location of 10 miles of its canal, if the same be upon surveyed lands, and if upon unsurveyed lands, within 12 months after the survey thereof by the United States, file with the register of the land office for the district where such land is located a map of its canal or ditch and reservoir; and upon the approval thereof by the Secretary of the Interior the same shall be noted upon the plats in said office, and thereafter all such lands over which such rights of way shall pass shall be disposed of subject to such right of way.

In 1898 an act was passed which contained the following section:

SEC. 2. That rights of way for ditches, canals, or reservoirs heretofore or hereafter approved under the provisions of sections 18, 19, 20, and 21 of the act entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, may be used for purposes of a public nature; and said rights of way may be used for purposes of water transportation, for domestic purposes, or for the development of power as subsidiary to the main purpose of irrigation.

In 1897 another act was passed to this effect:

That all reservoir sites reserved or to be reserved shall be open to use and occupation under the right-of-way act of March 3, 1891. And any State is hereby authorized to improve and occupy such reservoir sites to the same extent as an individual or private corporation, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Then, again, in 1901 an act was passed covering as well lands which might become the site of a dam to be used in the generation of hydroelectric power, which read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, under general regulations to be fixed by him, to permit the use of rights of way through the public lands, forest and other reservations of the United States, and the Yosemite, Sequoia, and General Grant National Parks, California, for electrical plants, poles, and lines for the generation and distribution of electrical power, and for telephone and telegraph purposes, and for canals, ditches, pipes and pipe lines, flumes, tunnels, or other water conduits, and for water plants, dams, and reservoirs used to promote irrigation or mining or quarrying, or the manufacturing or cutting of timber or lumber, or the supplying of water for domestic, public, or any other beneficial uses to the extent of the ground occupied by such canals, ditches, flumes, tunnels, reservoirs, or other water conduits or water plants, or electrical or other works permitted hereunder, and not to exceed 50 feet on each side of the marginal limits thereof, or not to exceed 50 feet on each side of the center line of such pipes and pipe lines, electrical, telegraph, and telephone lines and poles, by any citizen, association, or corporation of the United States, where it is intended by such to exercise the use permitted hereunder or any one or more of the purposes herein named: Provided, That such permits shall be allowed within or through any of said parks or any forest, military, Indian, or other reservation only upon the approval of the chief officer of the department under whose supervision such park or reservation falls and upon a finding by him that the same is not incompatible with the public interest: Provided further, That all permits given hereunder for telegraph and telephone purposes shall be subject to the provision of title 65 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and amendments thereto, regulating rights of way for telegraph companies over the public domain: And provided further, That any permission given by the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act may be revoked by him or his successor in his discretion, and shall not be held to confer any right, or easement, or interest in, to, or over any public land, reservation, or park.

Mr. President, it is this last statute which, in its operation, gives rise to the necessity which the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands is intended to meet. This whole subject of the disposition of power sites upon the public domain is dealt with in that particular act, so that if a dam is to be constructed in a navigable stream and upon land belonging to the Government of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior will have the right to dispose of those lands under the terms and provisions of this bill; but if the dam is built in an nonnavigable stream and upon land belonging to the Government of the United States, that land will be disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, and under what may be very essentially different terms and conditions. I submit that a system of that character is intolerable, if it is not impossible.

Mr. President, what is the reason why the disposition of these particular lands should be taken out of the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, where they now rest, the same as the disposition of all other lands, and transferred to the Secretary of War? The subject of the disposition of power sites upon the public domain and the law governing the construction of dams in navigable streams have been the subject of very earnest debate and discussion for a period of 10 years. It is not now necessary to recite the extreme views entertained upon these matters by the contending and warring interests and individuals.

It is enough for the present purpose to say that in recent years and within that same period the eyes of the public in general have been directed upon the Secretary of the Interior, who is charged under the law with the administration of the law in relation to the disposition of the public lands, and the eye of the public has been particularly upon him with reference to the disposition of power sites. He stands in the spotlight before the people of the country with reference to that matter. Those of our citizens, actuated by the very highest motives, who believe that in the past frauds of a gigantic character have been perpetrated, by which the public lands have been diverted from the purpose that Congress intended they should subserve, have looked to the Secretary of the Interior to preserve the public interests with reference to them. He stands at all times, sir, "in that fierce light which beats upon a throne" with reference to this particular subject. He can not make an order concerning the disposition of any of these great public interests without everybody being advised of it. Therefore he is called upon to exercise the greatest degree of circumspection in connection with any permit which contemplates the disposition of these things.

The Secretary of War does not know anything about these matters. Whoever in the future may be chosen to occupy the exceedingly responsible position of Secretary of the Interior will in all probability be some man who has well-defined ideas in relation to this all-important subject—the disposition of power sites upon the public domain. The public will want to know where he stands with reference to that particular question. But the Secreatry of War, who is chosen with reference to entirely different duties, in all reasonable probability has never given any thought or study to the subject at all. He is not chosen with reference to any ideas he may have concerning the disposition of the public lands.

Mr. President, I referred a while ago to those two contending forces that have been debating for the entertainment and enlightenment and possibly for the benefit of the public for 10 years this question of the disposition of power sites on the public domain. I had hoped, sir, that in the preparation of this bill the gentlemen who have it in charge would endeavor, if possible, to find some middle ground upon which they could proceed, presenting some measure that might, to some extent at least, insure the support of all of those who are very desirous of having legislation upon this subject; but, Mr. President——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH. I will yield in just a moment, if the Senator will pardon me. But, Mr. President, if we are to get any legislation at all on this subject there must be concessions, certainly upon essential matters, and if this is deemed unessential by the gentlemen in charge of this bill, certainly they ought not to insist upon this provision remaining in the bill, which will unquestionably excite the persistent antagonism of those whom they choose to stigmatize as "conservationists."

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has touched the weakness and, I think, the vice of this whole effort at legislation—the effort to combine the use and disposition of the land with the use and the flow of the stream that runs past it. The provision under discussion accentuates that difficulty, for the simple reason that the Secretary of War has absolutely no jurisdiction over the land and has not, and should not have, any power of disposal, so far as the land is concerned. His jurisdiction rests upon the navigability of the stream, and upon that alone. However, I suggest to the Senator that the difficulty about it is the effort to combine these two together. That is where the Senator and I differ with respect to this legislation. I think the vice of it is that there is an attempt, through the civil ownership of the land, to vest in the Secretary of the Interior, and now in the Secretary of War, the power to control the use of water which belongs to the States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from California that I am entirely unable to understand how the combination of which he speaks can be avoided. If a dam is constructed in a navigable stream, it will of necessity flood public lands, if there are any public lands within the area that the backed waters cover. Some provision, as a matter of course, must be made for the acquisition by the permittee of the right thus to flood those public lands. I do not see how the Senator from California can escape that conclusion.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Senator evidently has not understood my suggestion. It is not simply a question of the taking of the land by reason of the overflow caused by the construction of the dam. It is proposed in this bill, and it is proposed in the other bill which the Senator has mentioned, to control the use or disposition of the water after it is stored. That is quite another thing. Of course, the Senator is right in saying that the land which the construction of the dam would cause to be overflowed would have to be acquired by the persons constructing the dam. There is no dispute between us respecting that matter at all.

Mr. WALSH. I understand now that the remarks of the Senator from California are addressed to some other feature of this bill. When the other feature of the bill is reached, I am sure that we will be very glad to hear the Senator upon that, because I know very well the general views which he entertains upon that subject, and he is entitled to very special consideration because of his long study of this subject and the interest which it has in his own State, but we have not as yet reached that point.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator in what he has been saying has reached that point, because the disposition of land for any purpose as between the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior is now being discussed by the Senator from Montana, and it involves the whole question of the right to dispose of the land in connection with the use of the water.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, we have reached a point where we have to provide how the land to be flooded is to be acquired by the permittee who has the right to erect the dam, and the question is, To which officer shall he go to get that permit? That is the question that is now presented by the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator, in all seriousness, if the bill as drawn does not specifically state how that shall be done? I desire to read the language of the bill following the amendment which he has already offered.

Mr. KENYON. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment of the Senator from Montana is to be inserted on page 6, line 12, after the words "Secretary of War," "and the Secretary of the Interior." The bill provides that, with the authority of the Secretary of War, the grantee may—occupy and use, to the extent necessary for the project, any lands of the United States, including the public lands—

Following that this provision is found:

And any part of the public lands may, on certification by the Secretary of War that the same is required for navigation purposes, be withdrawn by the President for said purpose as provided in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawal of public lands in certain cases, approved June 25, 1910"; and for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges based upon its value as land as may be fixed by the Secretary of War—

And so forth.

Now, I want to ask the Senator if that is not exactly similar to the case where lands have been withdrawn by the President of the United States for forest purposes? When lands in forest reserves are classified as agricultural lands by the Secretary of Agriculture and entry is allowed upon them, do not the entrymen secure a title through the Secretary of the Interior, although the Secretary of the Interior has no authority whatever as to the classification of land in forest reserves? The withdrawal order of the President prevents the lands from being entered by any citizen of the United States for any purpose until the lands have been classified; and, when so classified, it takes an order of the President of the United States to release the lands from his former order before any entry can be made on them. I can not see why the Secretary of War can not designate the lands referred to in this provision, because he certainly has authority over the navigable streams of the country, and the War Department Corps of Engineers will inform him of the lands that are to be flooded. Therefore he is, it seems to me, the proper official to designate the lands and to request the President to make the withdrawal order as provided in the bill.

It does seem to me that, if we now accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, it will be the means of bringing about a conflict of authority which I think should be avoided.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator intended to ask me a question. It is not very clear in my mind exactly what the question is, but I might be able to clarify the subject in the minds of some of the other Senators on the floor, if not in the mind of the Senator from Utah, if I said that this provision has three separate and distinct clauses in it: First, that the permit shall be issued by the Secretary of War; second, that whenever the Secretary of War believes that certain lands now open to appropriation are necessary in the interest of navigation he may have those lands withdrawn; and, third, that when those lands are withdrawn, or are utilized, even if they are not withdrawn, under the permit, the charges for the use of that land shall be fixed by the Secretary of War. There are three propositions, which are divided by semicolons in the bill. One has not a thing to do with the other. The first is the one to which my amendment is addressed. The first is a plain proposition that when the permittee desires to make use of public lands the Secretary of War shall issue him a permit. I move to amend that by providing that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior shall issue the permit. The withdrawal proposition is an entirely separate matter.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to occupy but a moment. It seems to me that we are overlooking the fact that we are disposing of these lands by legislation and not by an administrative order. We are proposing to dispose of these lands by this act itself, and we are simply leaving it to an administrative officer to carry out our declared intentions.

This bill provides for permits to be issued by the Secretary of War for the building of dams in navigable streams. The first thing for the Secretary of War to determine is not what public lands are to be taken, but what is the necessity for the building of such dams in the interest of navigation and the development of water power and what conditions must be imposed on such permits. Those are the essential things for the Secretary of War to pass upon. Anyone desiring such a permit will, of course, have a map prepared, and if it be found that any public land is very likely to be overflowed because of the dam the person seeking the permit will bring this fact to the attention of the Secretary of War. After the Secretary has considered the importance of building the dam and has determined the conditions under which it shall be built, then, as it seems to me, we say to him, "Give a permit to use whatever public land is necessary to be overflowed in order to conserve the purposes of navigation that you want promoted." I do not think he has any discretion, and he ought not to have any discretion, with reference to the use of the public land. Whenever he finds that a dam is necessary in the interest of navigation and that the conditions which he thinks ought to be complied with will be complied with, then those desiring to build the dam ought to have the use of the necessary public land. That is what we intend them to have by the passage of this legislation.

The purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Montana, as disclosed by the argument here, is purely to give to another officer the power to interfere with the granting of that permit by the Secretary of War in the interests of navigation, and to give it to an administrative officer, with the declared intention that he shall impose such conditions, not as Congress thinks ought to be imposed, but such as he thinks ought to be imposed for the use of the public land. I think that Congress ought to lay down the conditions under which permits shall be granted, and then it should be left to the administrative officer simply to administer what we declare to be the law. We ought to declare what our policy shall be and not leave it to some administrative officer to determine what the policy ought to be and change it possibly every two, three, or four years. We ought to say what we want done; and that is what I think we have said here. We have said that whenever a dam ought to be built for navigation purposes, and the Secretary of War fixes the conditions under which the dam for such purposes ought to be built, then the permittee shall have the use of the public lands.

The Senator from Montana has said that it will be almost impossible to carry that out, because the Secretary of the Interior has control over the disposition of the public lands. I do not think so. We are disposing of the land ourselves. It would be a very easy matter to provide that when the Secretary of War finds that the permittee must have certain land he shall certify a description of that land to the Secretary of the Interior. That would make it a matter of record in the Department of the Interior and would take care of that objection very fully.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has well expressed the purpose of this bill, and I only wish to add a few words to what he has so well said upon the subject.

The statutes which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has read were passed under a provision of the Constitution authorizing the Congress to dispose of the public lands. Under the policy of the Government the jurisdiction over public lands has been given to the Secretary of the Interior, and where there is as a rule a conflict of that jurisdiction with that of any other department that policy ought to be maintained, but in all cases where a conflict arises between the departments it must be settled in favor of one or the other if we are to have a practical law.

I am not familiar with the method of withdrawing lands from the public domain for forest reserves; but, as I understand the Senator from Utah, the method prescribed by the statutes is exactly what is proposed to be done here—that they are withdrawn from the public domain upon a certification of the Secretary of Agriculture, the forest reserves being within the jurisdiction of that department.

This bill is predicated upon an entirely different clause of the Constitution. Congress gets its authority to enact it, if it has such authority, from an entirely different clause of the Constitution than that of the disposition of the public domain. The ground upon which Congress can consider the matter and enact this legislation is the commerce clause of the Constitution. It is the improvement of the navigable rivers of this country to which alone this bill relates. The jurisdiction over navigable waters has been given to the Secretary of War. In all matters relating to the development of navigation on the rivers it is proper that all powers should be vested in the Secretary of War. It is absolutely necessary in order to prevent confusion and the embarrassment of that department.

If the amendment is agreed to, there will be a conflict of jurisdiction, and each of these heads of departments can embarrass the other in the exercise of his proper jurisdiction. As was said by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Secretary of the Interior then is given a check, where public lands are concerned, upon all the actions of the Secretary of War in developing navigation in the navigable rivers of the country. It is obvious that such a thing ought not to be done. It is confusing the jurisdiction of the two departments. The use of these public lands is a mere incident to navigation.

There is no possibility here of the interests of the people, as suggested by the Senator from Montana, being abused or injured. The Secretary of War is a cabinet officer equal in dignity with the Secretary of the Interior. One is just as much in the spotlight as the other in respect to his duties and his powers. There is no danger whatever in this clause of anyone being prejudiced. There is no more danger that the Secretary of War will abuse his authority, or be unfaithful to the people, than there is that the Secretary of the Interior will do so; and I can see no room for the argument presented by the Senator from Montana upon that subject.

The committee considering this bill have thought it best to give jurisdiction to the department having jurisdiction of it on the sole ground that Congress has the right to consider and enact it, and for that reason they vested this power in the Secretary of War.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee if this specific matter was debated by the committee?

Mr. SHIELDS. I will answer the Senator from Montana by saying that this bill has been more thoroughly considered than any bill I have had occasion to be connected with since I have been in the Senate. The bill was introduced at the last session of Congress, and the subcommittee in charge of it was composed of Senators some of whom had been here a long time and had had great experience in such matters. The then Senator from Ohio, Mr. Burton, was a member of that subcommittee. From what I know of these matters, and from the reports he had made upon various projects, and from his connection with the rivers and harbors bills and the improvement of the waterways of the country, I should say that he perhaps had more thorough knowledge of the subject than any other Member of the body at that time. Senators BANKHEAD, SIMMONS, and NELSON were also members of that subcommittee. The bill was read over and considered section by section by that subcommittee. I think two weeks or perhaps more were devoted to it. That bill was recommended favorably for passage, but was not reached at the last session. Substantially in the same form it was reintroduced at this session. The same subcommittee was appointed, except that Senator JONES, of Washington, took the place of Senator Burton; and it was again considered very fully and unanimously reported to the Committee on Commerce and unanimously reported to the Senate.

I can not remember the views that different Senators took in regard to different clauses or different provisions; but I will venture to say that every provision of the bill, including this one, was carefully considered, and every effort was made to report a bill that protected the authority of the United States over navigable streams, the sovereignty of the States, the riparian proprietors, and especial care and attention was given to protecting the interests of the consumers, for whose interest at last this bill is sought to be enacted into law. It was attempted to get a practicable, workable bill; and all the officers and all those who have been interested in water-power development have agreed that the previous legislation absolutely prohibited such development. It is the belief of the committee that this bill accomplishes the purposes for which they so earnestly worked.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I understand the Senator to say that he has no recollection of this specific provision being the subject of debate before the committee. I want to inquire now of the Senator—because, of course, we all understand that there is only a handful of Senators in the Chamber at any time while this bill is under discussion; they go out to the cloakrooms, and when they come in they inquire where the committee stands on this matter—how many witnesses were examined by the committee in the hearings it held?

Mr. SHIELDS. None whatever. I hope the Senator does not think that any witnesses could have thrown any light upon the subject of his amendment. As to a full understanding, though, of all these matters, there are thousands of pages of hearings and of reports and of able articles written by parties who have given a great deal of attention and study to this matter, and upon all sides of the question.

Mr. WALSH. I should think the Secretary of the Interior might have thrown some light upon the wisdom of this change in the law.

Mr. SHIELDS. I can not see what light he could have thrown upon it or what information he could have given to that committee.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me right there, it is perfectly competent for Congress to dispose of the public land as it pleases, without the interposition of any Secretary or any department of the Government. Legislation has been crippled constantly, and I think materially injured, by taking too much advice not only from one but from all of the departments, until now we have the common rule of referring to them the simplest fact on earth that we ourselves know to be pertinent for their advice as to whether or not it ought to be made the subject of legislation. I have protested against it ever since I have been in either House of Congress.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Military Affairs Committee are now considering military measures. Would the Senator from Arizona think that they ought not to call before them the Secretary of War, to ask him what he thinks about those measures?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think whenever they need information from the Secretary of War they ought to call for it, as they have done; but I do not think we should run to ask the advice of every Secretary, when we ourselves are just as well informed as the various Secretaries are. In other words, as Congress has the absolute power in the matter, it has the absolute responsibility; and what we want is not policies, not advice, but information from the departments. That used to be the old rule—that we asked simply for the facts of a case, and never for the views of the department as to the advisability of proposed action by Congress after it became acquainted with the facts.

I can see nothing except complications in the amendment of the Senator from Montana. Why do you want the Secretary of the Interior to say whether or not certain lands shall be utilized that the Secretary of War, under this bill, has said must be submerged in order to carry out the great purpose of navigation under the commerce clause of the Constitution?

When I refer to the Secretary of the Interior, I do not speak of the present incumbent, but of the office; for, while it may be graced now by the ablest and most patriotic man, it may be disgraced in 20 years by just the opposite kind of man. What I wish to call to the Senator's attention is that there is no need for anybody to pass upon this matter except the Secretary of War, under the power of Congress, which has told him to find the place where navigation ought to be improved, and he must find whether or not it should be done.

What good is done by the interposition of the Secretary of the Interior, except to raise the question as to whether or not the public lands are more valuable than navigation, and raise at once a conflict between these two jurisdictions, under which nothing would be done by either? That is what it amounts to. All the public lands that are submerged under this bill are submerged by order of Congress. Certainly nobody will want to locate the land after it is covered with water; and if the Secretary of War says that a dam should be built in a certain place for purposes of navigation, then it is not the business of any other department to say whether or not those submerged public lands ought to be submerged. Congress has passed upon the matter by giving the power to the Secretary of War, and that is all there is to it. The Secretary of War, under the survey, has to make a finding, and it is the easiest matter in the world for him to transmit the mere map of the lands submerged to the Secretary of the Interior, and enable him to keep his books straight. So that it is either merely a question of bookkeeping or it is a question of interposition by an entirely different authority, created for a different purpose, and having the question raised as to which is the more valuable—the land to be submerged or the dam which is to be built under this bill.

So I see nothing but complication in this amendment. I see no danger on earth to any public lands that are to be submerged by any navigable stream, and I am fearfully afraid that we are going to carry this word "navigation" a good deal further than I wish to see it carried. If they go any further than they have gone they will place under Federal jurisdiction the waters of every State, navigable or nonnavigable, if anywhere they empty into a navigable stream; and if that power is allowed to run up to every spring on every mountain side, we are at the mercy of the Federal Government in the development of every State west of the Mississippi River, or at least of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that the Secretaries of the Interior never have been backward in asking to be heard by any committee of the Senate whenever any question has been under consideration by a committee of the Senate. In connection with the bills that have been under consideration before the Public Lands Committee, including the power bill itself, the Secretary of the Interior has had representatives at the hearings, I believe, every day on which the hearings have been held. The Secretary of the Interior—not only the present one, but his predecessor—has appeared before the committee and presented his views on a number of bills. No committee of this body has ever denied the Secretary of the Interior the opportunity of appearing and testifying upon any bill that it had before it for consideration.

The Secretary of the Interior knew that this bill was being considered by the committee. If he had wanted to testify, all he would have had to do would have been simply to intimate it, and a time would have been set for him to appear before the committee, and he could have expressed whatever views he desired. Not only that, but he could have written his views to the chairman and they would have been presented to the committee by him and considered by it. I think it out of place to criticize the committee because of the fact that the Secretary of the Interior has not appeared before the committee upon this bill.

Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], if adopted, would change the whole theory of the bill. The bill would have to be changed from the beginning to the end. It seems to me that the bill as reported to the Senate has guarded every interest—not only the Government's interest but the interest of the consumer; and I call attention to the fact that under the bill the Secretary of War is compelled to receive certain information before he can grant a permit. On page 7, beginning in line 17, the bill provides:

In granting permits hereunder and fixing conditions thereof, and in prescribing rules and regulations as to the maintenance and operation of any structure to which this act is applicable, the Secretary of War, before acting, shall have the report and advice of the Chief of Engineers.

So I can not see how it is possible to guard the interests of the Government, or the interests of the man who expects to put his money into the project, or the interests of the consuming public more thoroughly than is provided in this bill. I have enough confidence in the Secretary of War to think that when a report is made to him by his Chief of Engineers and in that report the statement is made that a small piece of public land lying adjacent to a navigable river is necessary for the purpose of developing electric power and increasing the efficiency of the river for navigation, the Secretary of War will select such public lands as his Chief of Engineers says is necessary for the project; and I believe that the flooding of a small piece of public land will be no detriment to the Government of the United States, but will be a benefit to navigation and to the development of electric power that is so needed along some of our navigable rivers.

I can not see why this amendment is offered, unless it is offered for the purpose of complicating the provisions of the bill. I am not going to express my views as to the object of it. The Senator, of course, knows the object he has. I do not believe it will help the bill in any way, shape, or form, but I do believe it will complicate the administration of the provisions of the bill if adopted.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. Has this bill in its present form, if he knows, received the approval of the Secretary of War, or has it been submitted to the Secretary of War?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it, or a similar one, has been submitted to him. I have seen the report of the Secretary of War, and, while I do not want to say that the report was written on this bill, I have no doubt but that the principle of the bill has been approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. KENYON. I should be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the chairman of the committee can answer the question better than I can.

Mr. SHIELDS. This bill is in substantial conformity to the views of the Secretary of War, as expressed by him in a paper that he read before the House Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. KENYON. Was this bill itself, in its present form, submitted to the Secretary of War, and any opinion secured from him for the benefit of the committee?

Mr. SHIELDS. I could not say that this bill, in its present form, was, because there were some amendments made even in the Committee on Commerce; but this bill contains the elements, the substantial requisites, of the bill the Secretary of War advocated in the paper to which I have just referred. The bill, as introduced, was submitted to him.

Mr. KENYON. I am a member of the Committee on Commerce; but, as I remember, the day I was present the bill was read over, and there was some discussion of it, but not a very extended discussion, and not many of these questions were taken up, except, I think, in the last session. But I have been anxious to know whether the bill had been submitted to the Secretary of War and had been approved by him.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. The bill last year was approved by the Secretary of War. When the bill was first introduced at this session a copy of it was sent to him, and then another bill was introduced containing some amendments that the subcommittee thought ought to be made to it, and again a copy of it was sent to him. The committee never had any report from the Secretary of War, either favorable or unfavorable, and I am not aware of any objection that the Secretary of War had to any provision in the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Then I understand from the Senator that he does not know whether or not this bill, as it was before the committee, had received the approval of the Secretary of the War?

Mr. SHIELDS. I know that a similar bill had his approval.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee will allow me, I desire to state that my recollection is that a bill almost identical with this in its provisions was referred to the Secretary of War during the last Congress and met his express approval.

Mr. KENYON. I will ask the Senator whether there is anything on record in the hearings from the Secretary of War with reference to his views upon this bill?

Mr. NELSON. We had no hearings before the committee.

Mr. KENYON. The subcommittee?

Mr. NELSON. The subcommittee. We had no hearings in the Senate. There were hearings on a bill in the House, but we had no hearings before the Senate committee. The bill, substantially as it is now, was considered by the Secretary of War during the last Congress, and met with his approval; and I think I can safely say for the subcommittee that because of that fact we did not deem it essential to get the express approval of the Secretary of War at this session, because we had it before, from the same Secretary of War.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, can the Senator from Minnesota inform us where we will find the letter or other approval of the Secretary of War?

Mr. NELSON. I think it is in the files of the Committee on Commerce. It never was printed. It was sent in like other reports. Nearly all bills pending before the Committee on Commerce that relate to rivers and harbors or kindred matters are referred by us to the Secretary of War, and we get his reports on those bills; but as a rule those reports are not printed, unless their printing is asked for.

While I am on my feet I want to say further, in reference to this proposition—and I will take only a moment—that if Senators will examine this section of the bill they will find that the determination of the question whether or not a dam ought to be built at a given place, whether or not that application shall be granted, is left to the judicial judgment of the Secretary of War. If he once determines that a dam for navigation purposes should be built at a given point, all the rest of the duties in connection therewith are ministerial. If it is determined that a dam may be constructed, we say by this law that the public lands of the United States may be occupied and flooded, and all the Secretary of War has to do is to determine the boundaries of the public land. What department of the Government, with its engineering force, can better determine before a dam is built the area of public lands that will be flooded than the War Department, through its engineering force?

Under this bill all the Secretary of War has to do is to describe the area to be flooded and then apply to the President for a withdrawal of the land; and then, farther on, it is for the Secretary of War to determine what compensation is to be paid for the use of the public land. It seems to me that it would be utter folly to complicate this legislation by putting in the head of another department. I can not for the life of me see what can be accomplished by it. All such improvements as are involved in this bill come properly under the War Department, which has a skilled and expert force of engineers. Why complicate it by injecting into it a department and a corps of officers that have nothing to do with this branch of the case?

I can not see what good can be accomplished of a reformatory character or how the public can be better protected. It will simply bring another check upon the development of water power in this country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A roll call has been ordered.

Mr. KENYON. Is it a roll call or a vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is uncertain. The Chair supposes that the Senator from Alabama has a right to suggest the absence of a quorum, no response having been given on the roll call. The roll will be called to disclose the presence of a quorum.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not quite understand the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The roll is being called on the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama that a quorum is absent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Thank you.

So Mr. WALSH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. On page 6, line 23, before the word "Secretary," I move to insert the word "said" and after the word "War" to insert "and the said Secretary of the Interior."

This presents exactly the same question, this giving to the Secretary of the Interior joint authority with the Secretary of War to fix the charge that shall be exacted for the use of the public lands which are flooded or utilized for dam purposes. It presents exactly the same question as that on which the Senate has just voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. On page 6, line 22, I move to strike out the words "based upon its value as land." The bill reads as follows:

> And for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges based upon its value as land as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

If the amendment prevails the language will then be:

> And for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. President, in my opinion the language here used has no significance, because if charges are fixed upon the value of the land taken it will, of course, be a value based upon its value as land. But, of course, some significance must be given to this language, and I have no doubt that the purpose was to require the Secretary of War in fixing the value of the land as a basis for his charges to value it as agricultural land at, say, a dollar and a quarter an acre. That is not the proper basis upon which to fix the value of property.

The question was presented by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] the other day. When land is condemned for public use and a jury is called upon to determine what its value is and what should be paid for it, the rule is that the jury must take into consideration what value that particular land has for any purpose to which it can be devoted. Why should any distinction be made here? I referred to the case of Boom Co. against Patterson at that time, reported in the ninety-eighth volume of the Supreme Court Reports. As my recollection is, I said at the time, I think, in the ninety-seventh volume. Let me refer to what is there said by the Supreme Court—and I shall read only a brief paragraph—concerning the basis upon which the estimate is to be made. That was the case of an attempt to condemn three islands in the Mississippi River. They were rocky, sterile islands, unfruitful in character; they were useless for any purpose of which anybody could think, except to tie a boom to. A boom company sought to condemn them, and insisted that their value for boom purposes could not be taken into consideration. The court, however, said:

> The views we have expressed as to the justness of considering the peculiar fitness of the lands for particular purposes as an element in estimating their value find support in the several cases cited by counsel. Thus, In the Matter of Furmen Street (17 Wend., 669), where a lot upon which the owner had his residence was injured by cutting down an embankment in opening a street in the city of Brooklyn, the Supreme Court of New York said that neither the purpose to which the property was applied nor the intention of the owner in relation to its future enjoyment was a matter of much importance in determining the compensation to be made to him, but that the proper inquiry was, "What is the value of the property for the most advantageous uses to which it may be applied?" In Goodwin v. Cincinnati & Whitewater Canal Co. (18 Ohio St., 169), where a railroad company sought to appropriate the bed of a canal for its track, the Supreme Court of Ohio held that the rule of valuation was what the interest of the canal company was worth, not for canal purposes or for any other particular use, but generally for any and all uses for which it might be suitable. And in Young v. Harrison (17 Ga., 30), where land necessary for an abutment of a bridge was appropriated, the Supreme Court of Georgia held that its value was not to be restricted to its agricultural or productive capacities, but that inquiry might be made as to all purposes to which it could be applied, having reference to existing and prospective wants of the community. Its value as a bridge site was, therefore, allowed in the estimate of compensation to be awarded to the owner.

So, Mr. President, here is a boom site on a navigable stream owned by the Government of the United States. We will assume, as is ordinarily the case, that it is rocky in character, the stream having, by the processes of erosion, worked a channel through that solid rock. The rock has not perhaps any particular value for building purposes; it will produce nothing. What do you mean when you say that it must be paid for on the basis of "its value as land"?

Mr. HUGHES. The Secretary of War in the legislation now proposed is authorized to fix the charges?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUGHES. What redress has the applicant in case the Secretary fixes too heavy a charge?

Mr. WALSH. He has none. The Secretary of War is made the final arbiter.

Mr. HUGHES. Then the Secretary of War can, in his discretion, lay any charge he likes for this use in connection with the building of the dam; but I see the point the Senator makes is that we limit him, or are supposed to limit him, in this legislation to the value of the land as land?

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. KENYON. I will ask the Senator from Montana what appeal or remedy the grantee would want if he gets a valuable water site upon a compensation or charge "based upon its value as land," which would be practically nothing?

Mr. WALSH. In my view this language really means nothing, because its value as land is all the value it has; but, of course, it is introduced here for the purpose of making some rule other than the rule that would ordinarily obtain in determining the value of the particular land that was to be appropriated.

Mr. KENYON. Why should not the grantee pay to the United States reasonable charges based upon its value as a water-power site?

Mr. WALSH. Undoubtedly he should.

Mr. KENYON. That is what he has got it for, and not as land.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, let me remark that here is a man who owns a piece of land——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is no such purpose in the bill as the Senator from Montana has imagined; but, to relieve him, I am perfectly willing that it be based upon its value as land for any purpose. There is no object here whatever in limiting the authority of the Secretary of War in this matter; but I agree——

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will yield a moment, I will call his attention to a provision of the bill that I think entirely covers the objection of the Senator. I think the Senator from Montana is in error when he makes the statement that this particular charge is to be fixed on the value of the land alone. This is what the bill provides:

> And in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation, as well as to the business of said grantee.

In other words, the question of the value of the land is not what the mere land would be worth, lying idle as it is to-day, but the charges are to be fixed, based upon not only "the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation," but it must be "as well as to the business of said grantee." So, Mr. President, under the wording of the bill the Secretary of War can take into consideration every item of advantage to the grantee.

Mr. SHIELDS. And at the same time, taking into consideration the use of it for navigation purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly. I think the theory of the bill is also to take into consideration the use of the land for navigation purposes.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is the theory of the bill; and there was no intention in any way to limit the Secretary of War in fixing the value of the land. Taken in connection with the whole matter, it is like some of these other amendments. There is absolutely nothing in the proposed amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Tennessee to say that he has no objection to the elimination of the language to which the Senator from Montana has called attention?

Mr. SHIELDS. I have no objection to adding, after the words "based upon its value as land," the words "for any purpose," which, in fact, is provided for in a subsequent section.

Mr. HUGHES. Would there be any objection to striking out the words "as land," which would seem to be what the Senator from Montana wants?

Mr. SHIELDS. I think the symmetry of the bill, in view of a subsequent clause, would be best maintained by adding the words I suggest, so as to read, "based upon its value as land for any purpose." Of course, as land it can not be valuable for anything but for the purposes for which it is susceptible of use.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator from Tennessee kindly explain to us what construction would be given to this provision, if the words indicated by my amendment are stricken out, different from the construction which should be given to it as it stands?

Mr. SHIELDS. Has the Senator any desire to change the verbiage of this bill merely because it is his amendment, when it means the same thing?

Mr. WALSH. No. I have indicated the purpose of the amendment, if the Senator followed me—and I supposed he was following me——

Mr. SHIELDS. I was offering the concession in order to comply with the views of the Senator and to obviate the construction of which he thinks the provision susceptible. Of course, it was never so intended, and the subsequent provision, which was read by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], demonstrates that it was intended that the lands should be valued when disposed of to the grantee for every purpose for which they might be used.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I trust that this debate will not degenerate into anything like a personal controversy between the Senator from Tennessee and myself.

Mr. SHIELDS. It certainly will not from any choice of mine.

Mr. WALSH. I am very anxious to speed the consideration of the passage of this bill. I have no pride whatever in the amendments which I have tendered. I asked the Senator from Tennessee in perfect good faith to explain to the Senate what is the meaning in this bill of the language which I propose to excise by my motion.

Mr. SHIELDS. It was the purpose to fix the value of the land, as in condemnation proceedings, based on every purpose for which it might be valuable and every use of which it might be susceptible; and the subsequent clause read by the Senator from Utah shows that that is so beyond any question.

Mr. WALSH. Let me ask the Senator from Tennessee, then, whether that would not be the case if the words I have indicated were not in the bill: that is to say, would not then the valuation of the land be based on every purpose, every use to which it might be put?

Mr. SHIELDS. I think it would hardly express it as well as the bill expresses it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not before me a copy of the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Montana. It is, however, a very important one, and I wish to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if he will not now consent to a recess or adjournment and allow the amendment to be printed, and then we can take it up to-morrow morning?

Mr. SHIELDS. I am perfectly willing that the amendment be passed over until to-morrow, but I prefer not to adjourn. We can proceed with the consideration of some other amendment for half an hour.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in that connection I want to suggest this as an effect of the amendment of the Senator from Montana. To strike out those words would leave it to the Secretary of War, whoever he may be, to determine the policy which shall be followed in the fixing of the charge for the use of the land; in other words, he would be able to fix the charge at so much per horsepower developed, regardless of the value of the land. It is the purpose of this bill to have Congress itself declare the policy and to declare the basis upon which charges shall be fixed, and not to leave it to the uncertain opinion of some Secretary, who might have an opinion to-day of one character and some other opinion at some other time.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator that the matter of fixing rates rests with the States. The Secretary of War has no such power. If the Secretary of War fixes the charges to be paid to the Government, that of itself tends to fix the rates that must be paid by the consumer for the power. That is just what I object to.

Mr. JONES. There is no disagreement between the Senator and myself upon that proposition. The committee made a concession to the sentiment in favor of fixing a charge upon Government lands taken for power purposes; but the committee did not want to leave the method that should determine the charge, which is in effect a policy, to some administrative officer. We know just what the Secretary of the Interior insists upon. It has been the policy of the Secretary of the Interior for several years to insist that the compensation that shall come to the Government for the use of the public lands in connection with power development shall be based, not upon the land value in any way, but upon the horsepower developed. We concluded in this bill to determine ourselves the policy that should be followed, and to provide that the charges should be based upon the value of the land, and not upon the power developed.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Washington will give me his attention for a moment——

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. And allow me to remark that if that is what the committee desires to accomplish, then we should strike out the words "as land," so that it will read:

The grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges based upon its value as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator that I offered an amendment in the subcommittee to have the charge based upon the value of the land for any purpose for which it might be valuable. I was willing to go that far. The members of the subcommittee suggested this language as meaning the same thing; and it was agreeable to me. As the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] has said, the purpose was to fix the charge for the land according to any purpose for which it might be used, and what he now suggests would be entirely agreeable to me; but the language which the Senator from Montana would leave in the bill would permit any Secretary of War to determine the basis upon which the charges should be made; and that is what the committee did not want to do. The committee felt that it was the duty of Congress to determine the policy that should be followed; and while I agree with the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] that we ought not to put any tax on at all, and if this matter is to be discussed further, I should like to say something on that line. Yet, as a concession to the Senators who are in favor of exacting a charge for the use of the public land, we put this provision in the bill, not intending to restrict the charge according to the value of the land as mere agricultural land. The committee do not think that that is its effect; but if the Senator from Montana thinks that it is, we shall be willing to change that, so far as that is concerned, and to provide that the charge, whatever it may be, shall be based upon the land and not upon the power developed.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator, then, what the remainder of that section means? What can the Secretary of War take into consideration in fixing the charges?

Mr. JONES. I think that that makes clear the meaning. It was suggested that those words be put in for that purpose.

Mr. KENYON. That is, that the Secretary of War might take into consideration the use of the land for any other purpose?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I think so. I agree with that idea; but I would be perfectly willing, out of extra precaution, and because of the confidence I have in the judgment of the Senator from Montana, to put in additional words.

Mr. KENYON. Then, of course, there is a latitude allowed to the Secretary of War in fixing these charges?

Mr. JONES. Yes; that is true.

Mr. KENYON. So that it does not establish a policy, as the Senator suggests?

Mr. JONES. The land, and not the water power developed, must be taken as the basis of charges.

Mr. KENYON. And the Secretary of War can take into consideration any benefits accruing to the business of the grantee?

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; but we do not want the Secretary of War to take into account the water power developed at so much per kilowatt hour as the basis for determining the charges.

Mr. KENYON. That is the policy of the bill?

Mr. JONES. Yes; that is the policy.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I do not know whether I understand the spokesmen of the different factions with reference to this matter. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] gave us to understand that it was the purpose of the bill to enable the Secretary of War to make the charges in accordance with the value of the land, the land, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has said, being put to its most advantageous use. Now, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] does not seem to think that that was the intention of the bill, but that it was the intention of the bill to start the Secretary of War off with a certain policy. It does not seem to me that both parties can be satisfied, when the Senator from Montana is aiming to bring about one state of affairs and the Senator from Tennessee is aiming to bring about another state of affairs. So far as I am concerned, I should like to know just what is intended by this bill. I have definite ideas with reference to what I ought to do, but I have not very definite ideas with reference to what this language, apparently so ambiguous, will bring about.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New Jersey, if I may, that to my mind the ideas which the Senator from Washington would like to see incorporated in the bill as the governing feature of this part of it would be expressed if you should strike out the words "as land," so that it would read:

The grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges, based upon its value, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HUGHES. Would not that be satisfactory to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH. No; it would not. That is the point I wanted to speak of now. There is a very decided difference in policy. The Senator from Washington introduced a bill which has gone to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, or, at least, did during the last Congress, and was there considered. The Senator from Washington, I am sure, is very sincerely desirous of solving this problem, and he has his own ideas about how the thing ought to be done. That bill provides in substance, as this does, and as the power-site bill which is now before the Senate does, that a permit shall be granted for the use and occupancy of these sites for a period of 50 years, and that when the permit is granted the value of the land which is to be occupied by the permittee shall be determined either by agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the permittee, or, in case they can not agree, then by proceedings similar to proceedings in eminent domain before the United State District Court, and that when the value of the land is thus determined the permittee shall pay an annual charge of 5 per cent upon the value of the land as the terms and conditions upon which he is entitled to occupy it.

The bill which came from the Committee on Public Lands, however, proposes that instead of determining the annual charge that shall thus be paid, the Secretary of the Interior shall fix an annual charge based upon the amount of power produced and sold. So that this amendment really presents two radically different policies—one contemplating that the amount to be paid shall be a certain percentage upon the value of the property used; the other contemplating that it shall be based upon the amount of power produced and sold, so that the more valuable the site shall become, by virtue of its use in the future, the more the man will pay. If it proves that it is not valuable, and he does not sell any power, his payments decrease proportionately.

The idea which is embodied in the bills coming from the House committee is expressed in the amendment which I propose, leaving it to the Secretary of War to base the annual charges which he makes upon such principles as to him seem proper. That would give him an opportunity to fix the annual charges upon the basis of the water power produced. This would embody the principle of the bill offered during the last session by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. HUGHES. I thank the Senator. I think he has made his position and that of the opponents of the amendment clear, but it still seems to me that the language I suggested would bring about the object that he seeks to bring about. For instance, if the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to lay a charge that is equal to the value, why would not that value, as the Senator said a while ago, be a value based upon the most advantageous use to which the property could be put?

Mr. WALSH. That is right. The Senator is absolutely correct about that. If the idea of the Senator from Washington is to find expression in the bill, to my mind you would cut out the words "as land."

Mr. HUGHES. "As land"?

Mr. WALSH. "As land." If the idea which I think ought to prevail should be adopted, you would cut out all of it, as I have suggested.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HUGHES. Just a moment. I must say that that does not appear at all clear to me. Do I understand the Senator to mean that he does not want the Secretary of War to pay any attention to value? Would not the horsepower generated have some relation to the value of the land?

Mr. WALSH. Undoubtedly. The power site would have a value depending to no small extent upon the probability of its being put to profitable use as a power site.

Mr. HUGHES. Why would not that be everything that the Senator desires?

Mr. WALSH. Because my idea about the matter is that it is a fairer method and a more just method not to speculate on what will be done in the future, giving the Secretary of War an opportunity to put an extraordinary value upon it at the outset. For instance, suppose he puts upon it a value, we will say, of $1,000,000. At 5 per cent that would be $50,000 a year that the permittee would have to pay. Now, he might not find a market for his power, and yet he would be obliged to pay this $50,000 a year for his power site worth a million dollars. Suppose, now, that he sold only, we will say, 20,000 horsepower, and the rate was fixed at 10 cents a horsepower. He would pay in proportion to the amount of power he was able to develop and dispose of.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; I think I get the Senator's idea.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana, in referring to the provisions of the public-land bills, failed to state, as I think, the real differences between the bills. This bill relates only to improvements in navigable rivers, and those improvements are to be made at the expense of the grantee. In other words, a dam with all navigation facilities needed, according to plans and specifications submitted to the Secretary of War, is to be constructed at the exclusive expense of the grantee. The Government is not out one dollar. The public-land bills relate entirely to improvements upon public lands, and the provisions there are for the use of those public lands. They relate to waters that are not navigable. There are no dams to be built, in cases under those bills, at the expense of the grantee, nor are those dams to be maintained at the expense of the grantee. The bills are entirely different; the basis of them is entirely different; and the rights and equities of the parties are entirely different.

This land that is to be allowed to the company making the improvement is not to be used exclusively for power purposes but primarily for navigation purposes, and there should be no extra charge upon the grantee growing out of the water power for that development. The Government in this case owns nothing and has no rights whatever in the water. There is a different theory in the public-land case.

I wish to say to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] expressed the idea of the committee, and if I conveyed a different impression I was unfortunate in my statement of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. I will yield to the Senator from Washington in a moment. The sole object is one of policy, as stated by the Senator from Washington. I can see no injury whatever that could occur to anyone by making the bill read, as I suggested, "based upon its value as land for any purpose." I will ask the Senator from Montana whether he will accept that amendment?

Mr. WALSH. Why, no; that does not conform at all to my idea, Mr. President.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, in lieu of the Senator's amendment to strike out the words "based upon its value as land," I move that there be inserted, after the word "land," in line 22, the words "for any purpose," so as to make it read:

Based upon its value as land for any purpose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Washington will pardon me just a moment, I will say that that, in my judgment, will express exactly the idea which was in the mind of the Senator from Washington. I do not accept it, because I do not assent to that theory at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I wanted to inquire of the Senator from Tennessee whether, in his judgment, anyone acquiring a franchise under this bill would be authorized to make the improvement that the bill contemplates. If the State has certain rights there, would it not be necessary for him also to obtain a permit from the State? It seems to me that there will be rather a confusing state of affairs if you are going to have divided authority and jurisdiction over this matter.

I suppose that in navigable waters the State controls the bed of the stream, just as it does the land between high and low water on the shore of the sea; and the Senator says the State has authority to control the water flowing in navigable streams. We propose in this bill to grant authority to use that water. However you may frame the language, that is what is going to be done. We are going to grant authority to erect a permanent structure on the bed of the stream. Will it not be necessary, under the Senator's theory, for the grantee also to acquire a grant from the State; or will it be necessary? I am very much interested in knowing what the Senator's idea is on that subject.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator will find, in reading the whole bill, that the grantee, when applying to the Secretary of War for a permit, must come vested with all the rights under the laws of the State where the plant is proposed to be constructed; and I think his idea is covered by those provisions. I will say that the rights of the State in the waters of navigable streams are different in different States. Where the common law is in force certain rules apply, and in certain States where the doctrine of prior appropriation prevails different rules apply; and so it is left in the bill to that. The grantee must comply with the laws of the State where the water power is located.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator know of any State that has undertaken to grant franchises for the erection of dams in navigable streams, or for the development of water power in navigable streams?

Mr. HUGHES. I can cite one case.

Mr. SHIELDS. All the States had that power prior to the act of 1899, wherein Congress prohibited the erection of any structures in navigable waters without its consent. For 100 years the States controlled the matter entirely.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand that; but the Senator probably does not know of any State since the adoption of the Constitution that has undertaken to regulate the development of water power in navigable streams.

Mr. HUGHES. I can cite one instance to the Senator, if he is anxious to have one cited.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to know where it is located.

Mr. HUGHES. The company is situated in my county. The dam is across the bed of a navigable stream.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I can remember, at an early day in the State of Wisconsin, where hundreds of dams were erected under State legislation; and, as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] has well said, until this inhibitory law of 1909 or 1910 was passed there was nothing to restrain the States except the fact that the Federal Government might intervene if the dam interfered with navigation. But I have known of scores of dams in the State of Wisconsin that were erected under the act of the State legislature.

Mr. POINDEXTER. They were always erected, however, subject to the possible interference of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. That is true in any case. We could not legislate so as to cut off the Government under the commerce clause.

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is just one more remark I wanted to make. So far as the charges are concerned, there undoubtedly would be a conflict between the State authority and the Federal authority if the State should undertake to levy charges upon the plant to be developed under the terms of this bill.

RECESS.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 22, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. This is Unanimous Consent Calendar day, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. LOUIS RIVER, MINN AND WIS.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 3032) authorizing the County of St. Louis to construct a bridge across the St. Louis River between Minnesota and Wisconsin.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

KENESAW BATTLE GROUND.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9547) authorizing the acceptance by the United States Government from the Kenesaw Memorial Association of Illinois of a proposed gift of land on the Kenesaw battle field in the State of Georgia.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept from the Kenesaw Memorial Association, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, a gift of certain land, with all the improvements thereon, comprising a part of the Kenesaw battle field, said land being described as lot No. 116 and the east half of lot No. 107 in the nineteenth district and second section, in the county of Cobb and State of Georgia, and upon which a monument has been erected to certain organizations that participated in the fighting on Kenesaw Mountain.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

On page 2, after the word "mountain," insert the following: "Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States in carrying out the provisions of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman who is fathering this measure whether it is the purpose ultimately to have this 60 acres of land turned into a national park?

Mr. CANNON. The bill speaks for itself.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill does not speak far enough.

Mr. CANNON. What will happen in the future I do not know, but I know what ought to happen in the future. The 60 acres of land referred to cover the site of one of the most severe battles of the Civil War, in which many Illinois people and many soldiers from other States, especially Ohio, and I believe some Wisconsin people lost their lives. These 60 acres of land were obtained—my recollection is that the State of Illinois appropriated $50,000 to erect monuments there, and, finally, after all this was done, this bill was introduced to convey that property to the United States.

There have been many such transactions as to cemeteries. Many battle grounds have been marked, and I have no doubt that if this bill passes and becomes a law the United States will take possession of that battle ground and preserve it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not that the real purpose of turning this land over to the Government, so that the United States will take care of it in the future?

Mr. CANNON. Absolutely.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman, who is better informed in parliamentary history than any other Member of the House, tell us how many battle grounds of the Civil War have been taken over by the National Government and turned into national parks?

Mr. CANNON. Gettysburg, Antietam, Chickamauga, Mission Ridge, Lookout Mountain, Vicksburg, and many others. Not only that, but the cemeteries as well, scattered all over the Southland, and some I believe in the North, have been taken charge of by the Federal Government, and very properly, too. It was in the Congress before the last, as I recollect it, that the Confederate cemetery at Little Rock, Ark., was taken over by the Federal Government.

Mr. HAMLIN. And at Springfield, Mo.

Mr. CANNON. At Springfield, Mo., and at Little Rock. I think possibly I made the motion. If not, it was with my approval and my vote that it was placed under the care of the National Government.

Mr. HAMLIN. That was true at Springfield, Mo. I am sure, because I introduced the bill. This does not involve any expenditure on the part of the Government?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. It will involve some future expense.

Mr. HAMLIN. What I mean is that the land is not to be purchased by the National Government?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose is to turn it over to the Government.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think that is a very wise thing to do.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was wondering whether it was the intention to make a national park of every piece of land on which a battle has been fought in the history of the United States Government?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not understand that the gentleman from Illinois is in favor of taking over every piece of land on which a battle may have been fought at some time.

Mr. CANNON. Not at all; but this was one of the most fiercely contested battles in the Southland. The One hundred twenty-fifth Illinois, a regiment that was raised in my own district, was almost destroyed there, as many other regiments were. Col. Harmon, a prominent citizen and lawyer, colonel of the One hundred twenty-fifth Illinois, lost his life there, and my recollection is that probably 30 per cent of the regiment lost their lives in that battle, to say nothing about the wounded.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for an inquiry?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. As I understood from him, this will convey about 60 acres.

Mr. CANNON. Sixty acres, upon which the monuments have been erected.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Of course that is only a small part of the battle field, is it not?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; and still——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is any arrangement being made for extending this park to include more than 60 acres?

Mr. CANNON. Not that I know of.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am in hearty sympathy with the purpose of the bill, but I think it would really be better to have some provision made to extend the area to include the main part of the battle field.

Mr. CANNON. Whatever ought to be done to mark the battle ground properly, no doubt will be done, but that is a matter for the future. The State of Illinois initiated this movement, and appropriated, as I recollect, $50,000. I will not be certain about the amount.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Where is this land located with relation to the battle field.

Mr. CANNON. On the battle ground.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Does this refer to the charge on Kenesaw Mountain on the 27th of June, 1864?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. There was a very long line of battle that day. I was in that charge. The battle line was about 6 miles long.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I should like to know just where the land is located.

Mr. CANNON. I am not informed as to that.

Mr. SHERWOOD. That is where Gen. Harker was killed.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and where Col. Harmon was killed. It was a most terrific contest.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I was there; I know.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman, being there, knows far more about it than I do; but the State of Illinois has acquired this land and has erected monuments on it.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I am in favor of the bill; but I wanted to know just where the 60 acres are located.

Mr. CANNON. I believe it is at the point where the battle was most strenuous and where several Illinois regiments, especially the One hundred and twenty-fifth Illinois, lost very heavily.

Mr. SHERWOOD. It was strenuous all along the line.

Mr. CANNON. All along the line; yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Reserving the right to object, is this Kenesaw Memorial Association composed of citizens of Illinois?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and others.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why do they not show their patriotism——

Mr. CANNON. They have shown their patriotism and have acquired the 60 acres of land and have erected these monuments, the State making the appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why do they not continue such a good work?

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman mean why do they not buy the whole battle ground all along the line?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Every time two or three patriotic persons in Illinois or Ohio or somewhere buy a few acres of land and erect a monument thereon, and then get tired of their job, the United States assumes the responsibility of looking after it.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], who was present and had a part in that contest at Kenesaw Mountain, if, considering the number of men who were engaged and the great violence both in attack and in defense, it was not quite equal to anything that happened—not to say at Gettysburg, but at Antietam or at Pittsburg Landing or at Chickamauga—but less men were engaged.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object to that question on behalf of the gentleman from Ohio. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois ought to embarrass the gentleman from Ohio by asking such a question as that, by trying to get him to magnify this Battle of Kenesaw Mountain into the same rank with Gettysburg or Antietam or Spotsylvania or Chickamauga or some of the other noted battles. I do not think that is fair.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] is quite competent to care for himself without the aid of my good friend from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know, but the gentleman from Illinois is slightly embarrassing my good friend from Ohio, and I do not think he ought to take advantage of him in that way.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to make an inquiry of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not on the witness stand.

Mr. CANNON. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. With reference to the question asked by the gentleman from New York as to why these should not be maintained by Illinois, I would like to ask for whom was the battle fought and for whom did the men die; was it for Illinois or the United States? [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Minnesota is so ignorant as to require an answer I will answer; but I assume that he knows more than he is willing to admit, and so I will not answer the question. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I place in the RECORD a letter from Acting Secretary of War Breckinridge to Mr. L. J. Dawdy, secretary of the Kenesaw Memorial Association:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 18, 1915.

Mr. L. J. DAWDY,
Secretary Kenesaw Memorial Association, Peoria, Ill.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt, by reference from the Department of Justice, of your letter addressed to Hon. T. W. Gregory, Attorney General, under date of 5th instant, in which you state that the Kenesaw Memorial Association now owns 60 acres of land on the battle field at Kenesaw, Ga., on which a monument costing $20,000 has been erected to the memory of those who fell on said field, and that the said association wishes to deed the same to the General Government. You also inquire whether a deed from the Kenesaw Memorial Association is all that is necessary for transfer of title.

In reply I beg to inform you that, while there are special provisions relating to the acquisition of land for national-cemetery purposes (sec. 4870, Rev. Stat.), there are none to cover the acquisition of land for the purpose in question, so that the Secretary of War would have no authority under existing law to accept the land which the Kenesaw Memorial Association offers to convey to the Government. You are therefore advised that, in order to carry out the association's desire, steps should be taken to obtain authority from Congress for the acceptance of the land.

Very respectfully,

HENRY BRECKINRIDGE,
Acting Secretary of War.

Also a letter to Mr. Dawdy:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Marietta, Ga., September 4, 1905.

Mr. L. J. DAWDY,
Kenesaw Memorial Association, Peoria, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Having finished mapping the Kenesaw Mountain battle field, I leave here to-night. Have deferred writing to you until now, as I expected to hear from Maj. James, but have heard nothing of him.

Mr. V. B. Channell, who lives on your property, gave me what assistance I needed and pointed out the different trenches and points of interest, so I imagine I have included everything you want.

Very truly,

ROBERT COE,
Assistant Topographer.

Also a statement from Mr. Dawdy, of Peoria, Ill., touching the Battle of Kenesaw Mountain:

OFFICE OF THE KENESAW MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION,
Peoria, Ill., February 15, 1907.

The Kenesaw Memorial Association, organized under the laws of Illinois by the survivors of Dan McCook's brigade, now owns 65 acres of the Kenesaw battle field, where the brigade made its famous charge on Cheatham Hill June 27, 1864. The purpose of the association is to restore the earthworks, both Union and Confederate, to their condition at the time of the assault and to erect monuments to the memory of their comrades who fell there. This will require more money than the few survivors can raise by personal subscriptions, therefore application is made to the State legislature for assistance. To that end a bill (S. No. 188) has been introduced in the legisuature asking for an appropriation for the uses mentioned.

Those not familiar with the facts of that assault will no doubt ask why this brigade should ask this special favor, when there were so many Illinois troops which might seek a similar one. The answer is this: No other troops from Illinois had a similar experience—one which demonstrated that almost anything is possible for Illinois soldiers when properly led. This is said without any disparagement to other troops or their officers. Every soldier who saw much service, whether from Illinois or elsewhere, realized that all soldiers did not render like services. This was not their fault; it could not be otherwise, notwithstanding each equally well obeyed his orders. This fact was illustrated better at Kenesaw, perhaps, than on any other field, where Sherman made an attempt to break through Johnston's center and divide the Confederate Army. For that purpose four brigades of the Army of the Cumberland were selected to assault the center, which was well fortified with works and abatis in front. The remainder, or perhaps 30,000 men, of that Army were held in reserve, ready to rush through the breach had one been made, hence it was no fault of these reserves that they were not chosen to make the assault, but their good fortune; and every such reserve, like true soldiers and comrades, in their hearts prayed that the assaulting column might win out without great slaughter, as well as to concede to them all the glory that their achievement might entitle them to. Hence there can be no reason for believing that any other brigade will seek like aid, because there is not another brigade with a like achievement in that or any other war.

But to the facts of the assault. It was made by Mitchell's, Dan McCook's, Harker's, and Wagner's brigades in the order named, from right to left. The distance between the Union and Confederate works was about 400 yards—the former in the valley and the latter on the heights, perhaps 150 feet above the creek which the Federals had to cross. When the order was given these four brigades bounded over the Federal works, crossed a swampy branch, and started up the hill. This caused the Confederates to open with musketry and three different batteries, but notwithstanding this the Federals continued to climb the hill, and in spite of the deadly fire the works were reached by McCook's and Harker's brigades, out of breath and much fewer in numbers. The other brigades meeting with an enfilading fire from batteries, could not reach the works. Finally Harker's brigade fell back after losing many men, carrying with them their dying commander; thus leaving McCook's brigade on top of the hill in front of works almost impregnable. Their commander was mortally wounded on the works and borne to the rear; Col. Harmon, second in rank, assumed command and lived but a moment, when he, too, was borne to the rear. With dead and dying everywhere, Col. Dilworth, third in rank, took command and straightened out the lines, but the abatis prevented crossing in force. What should be done? Some were crouching behind their dead comrades still firing, while others with bayonet and tin cup were digging in the ground, determined to stay there notwithstanding they had lost more than 30 per cent, the losses being pretty evenly divided among the regiments, although one company of the Eighty-sixth Illinois lost 23 out of 40, or 57½ per cent, but all still clung to that hill for six days and nights without relief rather than surrender what had cost them so much. This brigade while thus near the Confederate works built works beneath the enemy's guns in open field, and both lines are there to-day, distant from each other only 30 paces, or less than 100 feet.

When the Light Brigade of Balaklava (made immortal by the lines of Tennyson) made its famous charge, it lost a less per cent than McCook, failed, and left the field. When Pickett's division made its renowned charge at Gettysburg it failed, in effect, and literally went to pieces, and was not reorganized until Lee had retreated into Virginia. No other charge was ever made with the same result as that of McCook. Grant at Vicksburg assaulted the works, but fell back again. The troops on either side of McCook's fell back to the place of starting, or nearly so. Where did any other troops render a like persistent heroic service? In what war or country has that tenacity of purpose been displayed as that of McCook's brigade at Kenesaw?

That brigade saw much heroic service. It opened the Battle of Perryville and made a splendid charge, although only 30 days from home. It opened the Battle of Chickamauga on Saturday morning, when it burned Reed's bridge; it closed that battle, firing the last shot on Sunday night, where the Government has erected tablets in evidence of that fact. It furnished the volunteers who rowed Sherman's troops across the Tennessee before the Battle of Mission Ridge, although they knew that the enemy's pickets lined the opposite shore It charged the Confederate works two months later at Jonesboro, where a Confederate brigade (Govan's) and a battery of 10 guns were captured. It has on its banners Perryville, Stone River, Chickamauga, Mission Ridge, Buzzard's Roost, Resaca, Rome, Newhope Church, Kenesaw, Peach Tree Creek, Atlanta, Jonesboro, Savannah, and Bentonville, where it helped to bury the last hope of the Confederacy.

Does anyone doubt that this brigade did not know what heroic service meant, or that they overestimate the character of their achievement on Cheatham Hill? Everyone must admit that Sherman's failure to divide the Confederate Army minimized the gallantry of the assaulting troops, but it was his mistake and not the fault of those who climbed that hill. Is not this brigade entitled to special recognition for an achievement without a parallel?

The forty-fourth assembly granted an appropriation two years ago without the least opposition, but the governor vetoed it because short of funds. Now conditions are better, we have good reasons for believing that the bill, if passed, will be approved. Since our former application the Federal Government has platted our land in manner similar to that of Chickamauga and Gettysburg, thus recognizing the merit of the old brigade.

McCook's brigade was composed of the following troops: Eighty-fifth, Eighty-sixth, and One hundred and twenty-fifth Illinois Infantry, and Battery I, Second Illinois Light Artillery, and Twenty-second Indiana and Fifty-second Ohio Infantry Regiments.

These statements can be verified by the official records of the War Department.

Respectfully, L. J. DAWDY, Secretary.

I also state that subsequent to the date of the letter the State of Illinois did appropriate for the monument which has been erected and the land acquired.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WATER RESERVOIRS, DURANGO, COLO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 28) to amend an act entitled "An act granting to the city of Durango, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs," approved March 1, 1907.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act granting to the city of Durango, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs," approved March 1, 1907 (34 Stat., 1053), be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That if the said city of Durango shall at any time hereafter abandon the lands above described and cease to use the same for said purposes, said above-described lands shall revert to the Government of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I am acquainted with the purpose sought in this bill, but there is one amendment that I think should be adopted, and that is with reference to requiring the approval of the mayor of the city of Durango as to the amount of timber that should be cut outside of the 100-foot reservation. I can not conceive of any conditions where the United States foresters should be restricted to the approval as to the kind and amount of timber that should be cut on the land away from the 100-foot line.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will try to explain that. As I understand it, a large part of this land is above what is known as timber line, the elevation above which no timber grows. Timber line in Colorado is usually about 11,000 feet elevation. I think there is very little timber of any value on most of this land.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it is not applicable, I do not wish to press the amendment. The bill provides that the Forest Service may dispose of the timber upon the land, with certain exceptions, "as shall be prescribed by the Forester and approved by the mayor of the city of Durango." I could not see why the mayor should hold up the disposition of such timber as the Forester deemed advisable should be cut.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is the language of the original act of Congress of March 1, 1907, on this subject. I do not know why it was put in. The only change that I have made in that law is to change the courses and distances and amend the description so as to leave out about 307 acres and take in 37 acres.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman agrees that it would be out of the ordinary to place a restriction on the United States Forester as to what timber he should cut on this land and that it should be visèed by the mayor of Durango.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the gentleman is correct. They do not use that language in legislation now, but I can see no harm in it, as it would probably apply to very little, if any, timber, anyway.

Mr. STAFFORD. If this land is above the timber line, I do not wish to press any amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

In brief, on March 1, 1907, Congress passed the act referred to (34 Stat., 1053), granting to the city of Durango, La Plata County, Colo., certain lands described by metes and bounds, "to have and to hold said lands to its use and behoof forever, for the purpose of water storage and supply of its waterworks and the protection of its water supply, and for such purposes said city shall forever have the right, in its discretion, to control and use any and all parts of the said premises herein granted and conveyed in the construction of reservoirs, conduits, and flumes, and in the laying of pipes and mains and in making such improvements as may be necessary to store, utilize, protect from pollution, and enjoy the waters contained in any natural or constructed reservoir, basins, or waterways upon said premises: Provided, That the city of Durango shall pay for said land the sum of $1.25 per acre."

The act also gives the Forest Service power to patrol said lands and to protect them from fire and trespass, and also gives the Forest Service the right to dispose of timber on said lands, except that growing within 100 feet from the margin of any natural or constructed reservoir, and so forth.

The city complied with all the requirements and paid for the land at the rate of $1.25 an acre, the amount paid being $3,852.85 for 3,049.87 acres, and the Government has retained that money ever since, and has never given the city the title to the land.

As above stated, the land was unsurveyed and the description was given by metes and bounds, courses and distances. It seems that before the patent was issued there was a second survey ordered, and this survey did not coincide with the former one. It was discovered that there were some errors in the description as to metes and bounds—the variations did not conform in all respects. The result was that the land described in that act of Congress contains 307 acres that is entirely over on another watershed outside of the drainage basin of the Florida River, and is of no earthly use to the city of Durango for reservoirs or drainage or otherwise in connection with its water supply, while the 37 acres that the city desired, and which is in that drainage basin, is not included in that survey. This bill merely amends that description so as to exclude that 307 acres and include the 37 acres that ought to have been in the former act of Congress.

When these discrepancies were discovered the Commissioner of the General Land Office declined to issue patent to the city and advised the city authorities that "no patent can be issued to the city on the present survey, and that action on its application 03778 will be withheld until such time as the city has opportunity to present the matter to Congress and secure an amendment to the grant by which the city will receive the lands as now described in the present survey."

I introduced this bill in pursuance of that recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the purpose of correcting the description and perfecting the title of said city to the lands desired for the protection of its water supply and in pursuance of and conformity with the intention of the act of Congress of March 1, 1907. All of these matters are fully set out in the reports of the Interior Department and in the several reports of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the city authorities of Durango. It will be shown from the records and the statement of the city attorney that the city authorities at all times acted with diligence and in entire good faith, paying for the land and receiving receiver's receipt for the same. But the patent was withheld because of this discrepancy. It has been a matter of great disappointment and much inconvenience and some financial loss to the city in being deprived of the title to this land all of these years through no fault whatever of the city. The Secretary of the Interior recommends the enactment of this amendment at the earliest convenient period, inasmuch as the matter has been so long delayed, and the city is anxious for some speedy legislation by which they may be entitled to the use of the land, and the committee therefore earnestly recommends the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

APPOINTMENT OF ASSISTANT INSPECTORS, STEAMBOAT-INSPECTION SERVICE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4786) to provide for the appointment of certain assistant inspectors, Steamboat-Inspection Service, at ports where they are acutally performing duty, but to which they are at present detailed.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the eighth paragraph of section 4414, Revised Statutes of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"And in addition the Secretary of Commerce may appoint, in districts or ports where the exigencies of the service require, assistant inspectors, at a salary for the port of New York of $2,000 a year each; for the port of New Orleans, La., the districts of Philadelphia, Pa., Baltimore, Md., the port of Boston, Mass., and the district of San Francisco, Cal., at $1,800 per year each; and for all other districts and ports at a salary not exceeding $1,600 a year each; and he may appoint a clerk to any such board at a compensation not exceeding $1,500 a year to each person so appointed. Every inspector provided for in this or the preceding sections of this title shall be paid his actual and reasonable traveling expenses incurred in the performance of his duties, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BENNET. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, or the gentleman who reported the bill, whether this affects in any way the men who are steamboat inspectors in the port of New York on a salary of $2,500 a year?

Mr. HARDY. It does not.

Mr. BENNET. This is only to make permanent those who are now temporary?

Mr. HARDY. It does nothing more than to give the right to appoint assistant inspectors where they are now detailed.

Mr. BENNET. It gives them a salary instead of depending upon fees?

Mr. HARDY. It does not change the present law as to salaries at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman why some limitation is not put on the number of men appointed?

Mr. HARDY. That is left to be fixed by the Committee on Appropriations. They can appoint none except those that are appropriated for, and that question you will see is dealt with fully in the testimony before the committee included in the report on the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The idea is to have this matter go finally to the Committee on Appropriations so that the Secretary may say how many men he needs.

Mr. HARDY. They determine the number and the pay except where the pay is now fixed by law, and we do not change that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman explain why we need these additional inspectors?

Mr. HARDY. I think I can explain it best by reading the testimony of Mr. Hoover, chief clerk of the Steamboat-Inspection Service. In answer to a question of mine he says:

Mr. HOOVER. The reasons are these: First, I should say that after July 1, 1905, boards of local inspectors were paid fixed salaries. Up to that time they had been paid according to the number of steamers inspected, and we believed that that placed a premium upon defective and inefficient inspection by limiting the man's salary to the number of steamers that he inspected. Hence their salaries were fixed. Now, at the time that was done—and that law was effective July 1, 1905—these words in section 4414 in regard to appointing the assistant inspectors at districts where there were 225 steamers or upward to be inspected annually were not also mentioned, but it was the understanding of the department from that time on that the number of steamers that were inspected in a district did not have any effect whatsoever upon the salaries. Therefore there remained from that time to the present day these assistant inspectors who were appointed at certain of these ports and detailed to certain other ports. Now, the effect is that to-day some of these ports where assistant inspectors have been appointed have fallen below the 225-steamer limit, where assistant inspectors are to be appointed, you understand, and appreciating that it is not a fair basis, simply the number of steamers that are inspected in the district, to base the number of men who shall be employed there, we want to get away from that and have this amendment made which should have been made back in 1905. It has been our understanding from that time on that we proceeded correctly in having these assistant inspectors at the place where they were appointed, even though that number of steamers had fallen below 225. I may say that in the last year we have gone over these statutes trying to bring them up to date wherever we found them defective, and in our efforts to do that we found this place here. We first discovered it—or we did not discover it, but thought of it carefully—when we were getting up the last estimates, and it occurred to me we ought to have that corrected and do directly that which we have been doing indirectly; that is to say, if there happen to be ports where the exigencies of the service require assistant inspectors of course we can actually appoint them, but we can not actually appoint them until you gentlemen appropriate so we will have money to pay them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to find out if this is intended to do with such a disaster as that of the Eastland, or if it is a normal increase?

Mr. HARDY. It is not a normal increase. It is an arrangement to cure the necessity of evading the law, as is done now, by appointing assistant inspectors at one station and transferring them to another.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This will improve the home service?

Mr. HARDY. That is the intention of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is to provide inspectors at the ports where they are needed?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Without having to take them away from the port where they are needed and transfer them to some other port?

Mr. HARDY. Yes; and, further, to give such increase as can be shown to the Committee on Appropriations is necessary for the exigencies of the service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has been the practice heretofore to withdraw men from a port like Philadelphia and transfer them to Cleveland. Is this intended to obviate that practice?

Mr. HARDY. This is intended to obviate the necessity for that practice.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And it makes no difference in the salaries?

Mr. HARDY. None whatever. We have not changed the salaries.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, at this time Buffalo is the only port on the Great Lakes where there are more than 225 vessels inspected. It is necessary to appoint assistant inspectors at Buffalo and then assign them to Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, or Milwaukee. The number of vessels has not been increasing, but the sizes are, and Buffalo will be the only port on the Great Lakes where more than 225 vessels are inspected. The purpose is simply to appoint assistant inspectors where they are needed. The number, of course, will be controlled by the Committee on Appropriations, after having heard the testimony as to the need for additional inspectors.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The inspectors in any home port will be in better position to attend to their duties hereafter, if this bill is passed?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; they will be at home.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are not to be picked up and sent somewhere else?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The report shows that the inspectors are sent to other ports when their services are needed in the local ports and inspection is not as rigid as it should be.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill why it is that the salaries fixed are, at New York, $2,000 a year; and then the other ports named, $1,800 a year; and then at those not named, $1,600 a year?

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I will say that those questions were propounded in committee, as to why we had not changed the existing law, and the fact is that we were of opinion, and the department was fearful, that if we went to changing existing law there would be objection to taking up the bill, and we might not get through anything. It was therefore proposed that we leave the bill as to salaries just as it is now, leaving that to be determined by the Committee on Appropriations when the question of appropriation came up.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to what he probably knows. For instance, the Puget Sound district under this bill will be entitled to only $1,600 a year. In the number of vessels the Puget Sound district is second in the United States, and for many years has been first upon the Pacific coast. The proposition of fixing the salary at $1,800 at these other ports where the number of vessels does not begin to compare with those in the Puget Sound district seems very unfair.

Mr. HARDY. If we go into that we will have every port on top of us asking changes for its particular port. The gentleman's colleague is on the committee, and he agreed with us that it was best that this be done.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Was he present when this was considered?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Of course, if the bill fixed the salary now I would certainly object, because that discrimination ought not to be made.

Mr. HARDY. And the gentleman would be right.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The second district in the United States ought not to be put down toward the tail end.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman is not alone in that inequality. It would involve a considerable investigation to determine the matter.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman think there will be any opportunity to correct that when it comes before the Committee on Appropriations? That committee would not have any authority to make that change.

Mr. HARDY. Not to change existing law, as I understand it, but a bill to revise the salaries of the inspectors would be a very different bill from this, which, in the language of the chief clerk, was simply to enable them to do directly the things they have been doing indirectly and in an evasive way heretofore, and also to give the benefit of home appointment to the inspectors that would serve at the different ports and avoid the expenditure of traveling from detailed places to places to which they were detailed.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would say that one of the gentleman's colleagues from the State of Washington is a member of the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I know he is.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And after considering the provisions of the bill, and considering the whole matter, realizing the serious problem that would be involved in a readjustment of the salaries, he thought it would be injudicious to undertake it in this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It was reported unanimously, was it not?

Mr. HARDY. Yes; unanimously.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask my colleague, who is a member of this committee, a question about this bill, and that is if he thinks it is fully satisfactory, so far as our section of the country is concerned?

Mr. HADLEY. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether the committee gave any consideration to the limit of the per diem allowance of expenses to which inspectors will be entitled? At present, as I understand the law, they are limited to a per diem of $5. Here the committee makes no limitation whatsoever as to the amount of actual traveling expenses, except that they "shall be reasonable." Will the gentleman have any objection—I do not believe there is anything in the report regarding this question—to inserting, after the word "duties," in line 10, the words "not exceeding $5 per diem"? That, I believe, is in consonance with existing law as to the inspectors in this service.

Mr. HARDY. If it is in consonance with existing law, it does not need to be inserted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here we are enacting new law and making no limitation whatever. Under this provision the Secretary would be authorized to visé accounts running to eight, ten dollars, and more. I think there should be some limitation on the amount of reasonable expenditures that these inspectors may incur, and $5 is a reasonable amount.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman will bear in mind that this bill applies only to one section of existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. And this one section authorizes the allowance of actual and reasonable traveling expenses. Since this law was originally passed we have provided the limitation of the amount of per diem expenses. We are here reenacting this provision without any limitation, and by reason of that fact they would be entitled to any amount that the department would consider reasonable.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman understand that the limitation of expenses he speaks of is included in another section of the law?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not another section under the general title of this law.

Mr. HARDY. If there is any limitation, it is not in section 4414 of existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. Now 4414 only is being amended. The other section, which provides a limitation, of which the gentleman speaks, is not touched by this bill nor affected by it. There is no question you can take up a section of a bill and amend it without going into the amending of other clauses or affecting them. This is not to be amended in any respect touching that. Section 4414 is being amended with one purpose, and one purpose only, and that is to enable the service to do directly what it is now doing evasively or indirectly, but it does not affect the salary——

Mr. STAFFORD. I am acquainted with the full purpose, for we have had that matter up for consideration this year in the preparation of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. HARDY. That is just what I am going to say; we simply reenact 4414 just as it stands, with one single, solitary change, that allows these inspectors to be appointed instead of detailed.

Mr. STAFFORD. The restriction, so far as the per diem allowance is concerned, has been carried on the appropriation bill. I submit to the gentleman that by our reenactment of another provision, this being a later enactment of Congress, the department would have the right to authorize any allowance to these men provided they considered the amount reasonable.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman is right that the restriction of cost to $5 is put in by the Appropriation Committee, it would be again, and this law would be just the same——

Mr. STAFFORD. But I can not see why there should be any objection on the part of the committee to having a limitation in this bill.

Mr. HARDY. We dislike to go into the amendment of the law in other respects that we have not examined fully before the committee.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. HULBERT. Do I understand the amendment suggested by the gentleman is in line 10, page 2?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. Would not the effect of the amendment suggested by the gentleman limit the transportation to $5 per diem if it were adopted?

Mr. STAFFORD. It might. These expenses usually include their hotel expenses, sleeping-car expenses, and so forth.

Mr. HULBERT. Are not the words "traveling expenses" used in line 9?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. Where is the provision for transportation in the bill?

Mr. HARDY. Look at line 11.

Mr. HULBERT. That is for the transportation of instruments, not individuals.

Mr. STAFFORD. There may be some other authorization of transportation charges.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, I think, is right. Beginning in line 7, on page 2, it provides:

Every inspector provided for in this or the preceding sections of this title shall be paid his actual and reasonable traveling expenses incurred in the performance of his duty, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments.

And I understand that is the only limitation under existing law.

My attention has never been called to the fact, if it is a fact, that excessive sums have been allowed for traveling expenses. The purpose of this bill, as explained by my colleague, is to provide for the appointment of these assistant inspectors at the ports where they are actually needed, rather than to appoint them at other ports like Buffalo and transfer them to the local ports, which, of course, involves travel pay and other incidental expenses. It will result in economy, we believe, and for that reason we have recommended it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I really think there should be some limitation as to the amount these inspectors should be allowed to use when traveling about the country.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have no objection to it, however. My attention has never been called to the fact that the law has been abused.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman like to have the bill passed over to another day in order to make an investigation?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not on that account, because I quite agree with the gentleman if there is any abuse, it ought to be remedied by legislation, and that might be done now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Usually there is a limitation.

Mr. HARDY. Have you carefully thought out an amendment that would reasonably limit that possibility?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have prepared just this phrase, "not exceeding $5 per diem."

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman consider the suggestion of incorporating in his amendment the further phrase "not including railroad fare or transportation"?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes. But I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. HARDY. I am afraid that if you paid his actual and reasonable traveling expenses, incurred in the performance of his duties, and were to limit that to not exceeding $5——

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not leave this matter to go over for two weeks, so as to give the members of the committee an opportunity to investigate that matter? There is no objection to the bill as it stands except as to that item.

Mr. HARDY. I really have no objection. If there is reason for putting the limitation there as to expenditure, I am willing to agree to it.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed informally and without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MARINE INSPECTION SERVICE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 4784, to provide for a change in the designation of the Steamboat-Inspection Service, and for other purposes.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Steamboat-Inspection Service of the Department of Commerce shall hereafter be known as the Marine Inspection Service, and the Supervising Inspector General shall be known as the Director of the Marine Inspection Service; and all the powers and duties possessed by the Supervising Inspector General shall be retained and exercised by the Director of the Marine Inspection Service. It is further provided that the Chief Clerk and Acting Supervising Inspector General shall hereafter be known as the Assistant Director of the Marine Inspection Service, and shall perform such duties as may be assigned to him by the Director or by the Secretary of Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this change of designation in the Steamboat-Inspection Service would not in any way confer new powers upon the Director of the Marine Inspection Service in the matter of craft not using steam power?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no. It is simply changing the name of the service to make it more appropriate. At the time the law was enacted it only applied to vessels propelled by steam, but now the Steamboat-Inspection Service includes vessels mechanically propelled, whether by steam or by gasoline, and there are other new types of vessels, such as the Diesel type of oil engines, and this bill simply makes the title more appropriate and to apply to all classes of vessels subject to inspection whether propelled by steam or otherwise propelled.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have read the letter of the Secretary of Commerce to the gentleman from Missouri, indicating that this would aid in the administration of the work of the department, but I would like to know if the gentleman has any data as to the number of vessels using gasoline.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That includes the motor boats?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. My general recollection is that there are——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Three or four hundred thousand?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Two hundred thousand or more, and the number is increasing all the while.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They would come under the new director?

Mr. ALEXANDER. They are already under the direction of the Steamboat-Inspection Service, but the title "Steamboat-Inspection Service" is not apt as applied to all kinds of marine craft.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a fact, is it not, that the number of vessels plying the inland waterways is increasing every year?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that most of them now come under the direction of what will be the Director of the Marine-Inspection Service?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman is right about that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 755) to incorporate the Boy Scouts of America, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Colin H. Livingstone and Ernest P. Bicknell, of Washington, D. C.; Benjamin L. Dulaney, of Bristol, Tenn.; Milton A. McRae, of Detroit, Mich.; David Starr Jordan, of Berkeley, Cal.; F. L. Seely, of Asheville, N. C.; A. Stamford White, of Chicago, Ill.; Ernest Thompson Seton, of Greenwich, Conn.; Daniel Carter Beard, of Flushing, N. Y.; George D. Pratt, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; Lee F. Hanmer, Jeremiah W. Jenks, Charles P. Neill, Frank Presbrey, Edgar M. Robinson, Mortimer L. Schiff, Lorillard Spencer, and James E. West, of New York, N. Y.; G. Barrett Rich, jr., of Buffalo, N. Y.; Robert Garrett, of Baltimore, Md.; John Sherman Hoyt, of Norwalk, Conn.; Charles C. Jackson, of Boston, Mass.; William D. Murray, of Plainfield, N. J.; and George D. Porter, of Philadelphia, Pa., their associates and successors, are hereby created a body corporate and politic of the District of Columbia, where its domicile shall be.

SEC. 2. That the name of this corporation shall be "Boy Scouts of America," and by that name it shall have perpetual succession, with power to sue and be sued in courts of law and equity within the jurisdiction of the United States; to hold such real and personal estate as shall be necessary for corporate purposes, and to receive real and personal property by gift, devise, or bequest; to adopt a seal, and the same to alter and destroy at pleasure; to have offices and conduct its business and affairs within and without the District of Columbia and in the several States and Territories of the United States; to make and adopt by-laws, rules and regulations not inconsistent with the laws of the United States of America, or any State thereof, and generally to do all such acts and things (including the establishment of regulations for the election of associates and successors) as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act and promote the purposes of said corporation.

SEC. 3. That the purpose of this corporation shall be to promote, through organization and cooperation with other agencies, the ability of boys to do things for themselves and others, to train them in scoutcraft, and to teach them patriotism, courage, self-reliance, and kindred virtues, using the methods which are now in common use by boy scouts.

SEC. 4. That said corporation may acquire, by way of gift, all the assets of the existing national organization of Boy Scouts, a corporation under the laws of the District of Columbia, and defray and provide for any debts or liabilities to the discharge of which said assets shall be applicable; but said corporation shall have no power to issue certificates of stock or to declare or pay dividends, its object and purposes being solely of a benevolent character and not for pecuniary profit to its members.

SEC. 5. That the governing body of the said Boy Scouts of America shall consist of an executive board composed of citizens of the United States. The number, qualifications, and terms of office of members of the executive board shall be prescribed by the by-laws. The persons mentioned in the first section of this act shall constitute the first executive board and shall serve until their successors are elected and have qualified. Vacancies in the executive board shall be filled by a majority vote of the remaining members thereof. The by-laws may prescribe the number of members of the executive board necessary to constitute a quorum of the board, which number may be less than a majority of the whole number of the board. The executive board shall have power to make and to amend the by-laws, and, by a two-thirds vote of the whole board at a meeting called for this purpose, may authorize and cause to be executed mortgages and liens upon the property of the corporation. The executive board may, by resolution passed by a majority of the whole board, designate three or more of their number to constitute an executive or governing committee, of which a majority shall constitute a quorum, which committee, to the extent provided in said resolution or in the by-laws of the corporation, shall have and exercise the powers of the executive board in the management of the business affairs of the corporation, and may have power to authorize the seal of the corporation to be affixed to all papers which may require it. The executive board, by the affirmative vote of a majority of the whole board, may appoint any other standing committees, and such standing committees shall have and may exercise such powers as shall be conferred or authorized by the by-laws. With the consent in writing and pursuant to an affirmative vote of a majority of the members of said corporation, the executive board shall have authority to dispose in any manner of the whole property of the corporation.

SEC. 6. That an annual meeting of the incorporators, their associates and successors, shall be held once in every year after the year of incorporation, at such time and place as shall be prescribed in the by-laws, when the annual reports of the officers and executive board shall be presented and members of the executive board elected for the ensuing year. Special meetings of the corporation may be called upon such notice as may be prescribed in the by-laws. The number of members which shall constitute a quorum at any annual or special meeting shall be prescribed in the by-laws. The members and executive board shall have power to hold their meetings and keep the seal, books, documents, and papers of the corporation within or without the District of Columbia.

SEC. 7. That said corporation shall have the sole and exclusive right to have and to use, in carrying out its purposes, all emblems and badges, descriptive or designating marks, and words or phrases now or heretofore used by the Boy Scouts of America in carrying out its program, it being distinctly and definitely understood, however, that nothing in this act shall interfere or conflict with established or vested rights.

SEC. 8. That on or before the 1st day of April of each year the said Boy Scouts of America shall make and transmit to Congress a report of its proceedings for the year ending December 31 preceding, including a full, complete, and itemized report of receipts and expenditures, of whatever kind.

SEC. 9. That Congress shall have the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act at any time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask, first, if there is any limitation in this bill as to the amount of property that this corporation may acquire?

Mr. GARD. Only such as is necessary for its proper purpose, I believe.

Mr. MANN. Where is that in the bill? How could that be determined?

Mr. GARD. Section 2 of the bill provides in lines 13 and 14 for the holding of such real and personal estate as shall be necessary for corporate purposes.

Mr. MANN. And it says:

And to receive real and personal property by gift, devise, or bequest.

Of course, there is no limitation. We have been usually very careful about that.

Mr. GARD. If there is any desire on the part of the gentleman to propose an amendment of that kind, of course it will be entertained. I do not believe it will be very material, because no information has come to us about the possibility of any such bequest or there being any trouble about the language adopted and used in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Well, probably no trouble would ever arise, and yet when Congress allows grants and charters it is usual to take some care on the subject. Here is a corporation governed by an executive board, the size of which is not fixed. It is hard to tell what may happen in the course of time. No one knows who may get hold of it in the end.

Mr. GARD. Well, if the gentleman has any idea about making the bill nearer perfect from a sense of protection, I am sure the proponents of the bill will be very glad to adopt it. I may say, however, that it was thought that no such question would arise. But if, out of caution, the gentleman desires to present anything of that kind, we have no objection.

Mr. MANN. I have not prepared anything to present. We have had a number of these matters before Congress at various times, and have usually adopted certain precautions, most of which may be in this bill. I do not undertake to say.

Mr. GARD. The bill is the same as that which was passed last year, I may say to the gentleman from Illinois, and as modeled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] it is proposed to embrace all the protective language that the bills of its kind have had when presented to the House. It is not a matter where it was thought that any amount of money or property to any considerable extent would come under the board of managers. It is simply a matter for the protection of the membership and the insignia of the organization rather than the getting together of any amount of property, whether real or personal. I take it that the situation could hardly arise when any very considerable amount of property would come under the control of the management of this organization.

Mr. MANN. So long as it is an organization such as the Boy Scouts now constitute there would be no difficulty or question about it at all.

Mr. GARD. I think not.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GARD. The character of the organization is not changed by the proposed incorporation.

Mr. MANN. But no one knows whether it will be changed hereafter at some time.

Mr. GARD. There is a reservation at the end of the bill that the Congress reserves the right to change or modify it at any time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois permit me for just a moment?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman recall a bill several years ago to incorporate the Grand Army of the Republic?

Mr. MANN. I remember it very distinctly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It contained features very similar to those in this bill, did it not?

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that it did. That was a case where a few gentlemen wanted to incorporate the Grand Army of the Republic, so that they might be the officials instead of leaving it as it was, and the great mass of the Grand Army were not in favor of the bill; and after we had disposed of it here temporarily they heard of it, and they killed it very quickly themselves.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] yield for a moment?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call your attention to the seventh section of this bill, not in a spirit of opposition at all because I would like to see the Boy Scouts incorporated. But does not section 7 confer certain sole and exclusive rights on this corporation that might lead to a possible violation of the patent and copyright laws of this country?

Mr. GARD. No, sir; I think not. Certain emblems and badges are already protected by the patent and copyright laws.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not that section of it confer upon the corporation the exclusive right to issue certain emblems, and so forth, having all the sanction, as it were, of the patent and copyright laws? I call the gentleman's attention to this because it has arisen in another instance. There is a long-standing effort here to incorporate a mother's day association, and it has not succeeded. There is a division of opinion as to the right of one organization or another to use certain emblems exclusively, and that has been one of the hindrances to the passage of legislation in connection with mother's day.

Mr. GARD. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I think this section will cover only the emblems and objects that are already protected by patent rights.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman familiar with the recent legislation of Congress in the matter of national incorporations? Does the gentleman recall the last act of Congress incorporating a national society?

Mr. GARD. I do not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The German-American Alliance was one of the last incorporations, was it not?

Mr. GARD. This bill was favorably reported in the last Congress and placed on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. I do not remember what was the last bill that was passed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not oppose this bill, for I think the cause is a very worthy one; I simply call to the gentleman's attention the points I have suggested.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I make an inquiry of the gentleman?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I have been very much interested in the Boy Scout movement, and somewhat actively, and I would be glad to have information from the gentleman as to whether the incorporators of this movement, as named in the bill, are named as incorporators practically with the consent or acquiescence of those who have heretofore been beneficially active in this movement? When I say "beneficially active," I do not mean those who have been following the general plan of the Boy Scouts on the outside, but those who have been earnestly seeking to promote this very valuable movement.

Mr. GARD. Yes; I will say to the gentleman that the list of incorporators given here was presented to the committee by those who represent that they have the interests of the organization at heart, and who have done all that they could consistently and properly to advance every interest of the organization.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. And does the gentleman believe that this embraces practically all of those that are leaders, or will it exclude from the activities of the Boy Scout organization others who have been equally active and who have equally the interest of the organization at heart? In other words, is it an attempt to gain for those who are named incorporators the control of this movement in a manner that would not be beneficial, but on the contrary somewhat detrimental?

Mr. GARD. It was stated to us—and that is the only information we have—that the list of incorporators is fairly representative of all who have a real, genuine interest in the organization known as the Boy Scouts, and there was no desire, and no evidence of any desire, on the part of any select number of persons to be incorporated to the exclusion of any other number. Does that answer the gentleman?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. It does, very satisfactorily.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT). Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, when we passed the bill in the last Congress the committee recommended an amendment which was agreed to, striking out the word "national" from the language, "existing national organizations," on page 3. I do not now recall why the committee asked the House to strike out the word "national," but I see in the bill as now reported there is no such change.

Mr. GARD. There has been no such request.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman reported the bill in the last Congress. Can he tell why that was done before?

Mr. GARD. Yes; because it was the policy of the committee then, and is now, to make this incorporation limited to the District of Columbia. Therefore the word "national" was stricken out.

Mr. MANN. That is hardly an answer, because that language is "the existing national organization of boy scouts."

Mr. GARD. It may be that I have not the right reference. Will the gentleman call my attention again to what he refers to?

Mr. MANN. Page 3, line 8. I did not know but the gentleman might remember why the committee asked the House before to strike out the word "national."

Mr. GARD. I have no recollection of that. I do not deem it to be very material. It is a word descriptive of the organization and has no legislative effect.

Mr. MANN. I do not say that it is material. That is what I was trying to find out. It was material enough, in the opinion of the gentleman two years ago, to induce him to move to strike it out.

Mr. GARD. It may have been unintentionally incorporated by the framer of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Are all of these incorporators still living?

Mr. GARD. I understand so.

Mr. MANN. Are they all now identified with the boy scouts?

Mr. GARD. That is my understanding, but I do not positively know. If there has been any change, the bill provides that their successors may be appointed.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I just happened to be called out of the Hall and have just gotten back onto the floor. A parliamentary inquiry. Is this the bill to incorporate the national boy scouts under a unanimous-consent proposition?

Mr. GARD. It is.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I have not had time to examine the matter, and I think that in justice to myself and to my obligation to the oath I have taken here I ought to have some time to investigate the contingent results, and I shall object for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas objects. The bill will be stricken from the calendar——

Mr. GARD. Do I understand that the gentleman from Texas objects?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I object until I have time to examine it. I am willing that it may go over without prejudice to the cause until I have time to investigate it.

Mr. CARLIN. Let me explain to the gentleman——

Mr. GARD. Probably the gentleman does not understand that this is merely to incorporate them in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I am willing that it shall go over without prejudice until I have time to investigate it.

Mr. GARD. It is not national in the sense that the gentleman probably thinks.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. If it goes through Congress, I am afraid it will be construed to be national.

Mr. HARDY. Let the gentleman ask that it go over without prejudice.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Yes; that is what I ask.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas objects to the present consideration of the bill, but asks unanimous consent that it may be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech made by Senator OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD recently in Chicago on the subject of an adequate transportation system.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of preparedness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of preparedness. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on rural credits. I ask for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the subject of rural credits at any time during the next five legislative days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NEW ORLEANS, BATON ROUGE & VICKSBURG RAILROAD CO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 540) for the relief of settlers within the limits of the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge & Vicksburg Railroad Co.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to immediately take up and resume the adjustment and adjudication of all rights and privileges relinquished, granted, conveyed, and confirmed to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Co., as the assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge & Vicksburg Railroad Co., by the act of Congress approved February 8, 1887, and entitled "An act to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge & Vicksburg Railroad Co., to confirm title to certain lands, and for other purposes," subject to all the provisions and conditions therein contained for the protection of actual settlers, their heirs, and assigns.

SEC. 2. That on the application of persons to make entry in accordance with the provisions of the act aforesaid, the rights only of those who were actual settlers at the date of definite location, their heirs, or other persons to whom they may have assigned their possessory rights prior to December 1, 1913, shall be given consideration as against the outstanding patent or patents to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Co.

SEC. 3. That in determining rights asserted by or on behalf of actual settlers, their heirs or assigns, proof showing actual settlement at the date of definite location and the existence of such settlement and occupancy at the present time shall be deemed prima facie evidence of the continuity of the settlement claim.

SEC. 4. That all claims adverse to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Co., or its successors in interest, which are not asserted as herein provided within the period of two years from the passage and approval of this act shall be deemed and considered forever barred.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], on the eve of his leaving the city to attend the bedside of a near relative who is seriously ill, asked me to submit a request that this bill be passed over without prejudice for two weeks. The gentleman from Michigan is directly interested in this.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not object until I have time to state the importance of this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection at all to the gentleman making his statement. It was only for the purpose of expediting the business of the House that I made the statement. I will not press the objection at the present time.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have already reserved the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves the right to object.

Mr. ASWELL. I hope the gentleman will not object to the consideration of this bill. It does not settle anything finally. It merely passes up to the Department of the Interior the adjustment of some 300 land cases involved in the New Orleans Pacific Railroad land grant by this Congress in 1871 and 1887. This bill has been favorably reported twice by the House Committee on the Public Lands. It was reported in the last Congress without a vote against it, and favorably reported again in this Congress. The bill passed this House on May 12, 1914, by unanimous consent. It has had a unanimously favorable report by the Committee on Public Lands in the Senate. It does not disturb anyone. It does not affect any lands in the United States except the lands in the eighth district of Louisiana. I sincerely hope that upon the broad principle of justice to the old settlers who have been living on these lands, some of them for 50 years, the gentleman will not object. These men have no money and no influence other than the merits of their case. Some of them have died since this bill was considered by this House in the last Congress. I do sincerely hope that gentlemen who are interested in the speculative mill companies who have purchased land in the South and have their headquarters in the Northwest—in Michigan—will look at this subject from the standpoint of justice to the poor man as well as to the more fortunately circumstanced. I hope no objection will be made to submitting this matter to the Interior Department. These settlers have been earnestly requesting and begging this Congress for 50 years for an opportunity to be heard, and to be given a chance to go before the Land Office and have their cases adjudicated by that department.

That is all the bill seeks to do and all the committee hopes to do. Furthermore, I wish to state to gentlemen of the House that the Department of the Interior—the Land Office—wrote every line and every syllable of this bill. It was written by the department and repeatedly indorsed by the department, approved twice by the Committee on the Public Lands, passed the House by unanimous consent, and was also favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Public Lands. If there is any bill that ever came before the House that could have more complete and unanimous support than this, I have not been able to discover it. I hope the gentleman will permit the bill to come up to-day for consideration, because it will not be long before these old men who came here last year and who now make this appeal will not be living.

I hope gentlemen will permit the bill to pass. I hope the gentleman will not object because of personal interest. I hope he will permit the bill to go through to-day.

The chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands is familiar with the bill, as are all members of the committee, and I think they will agree that what I have said is true and absolutely correct. I appeal to you to let it go through.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman insists on this bill being considered to-day, I shall have to object.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STAFFORD. The reservation of the objection is still pending.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes. This bill was drafted this year by the department; it was drafted last year by the department; it was asked for last year by the department, and it is asked for again this year. We had long hearings last year. A large delegation of these old settlers journeyed up here to appeal to Congress. Some of them had lived on these lands for 50 years.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does the gentleman think that inasmuch as some of us have our minds made up as to what we are going to do that it is necessary to take the time of the House in a one-sided discussion?

Mr. FERRIS. I am not going to take up much time; I do not generally occupy much time of the House. I do not consume time unless I think it is necessary.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I see that the report on the bill states—

After the most painstaking investigation and the fullest consideration it is the deliberate opinion of this committee—

And so forth.

What is the usual character of the investigation by the committee and is not the opinion of the committee usually a "deliberate opinion"?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, of course, the gentleman is not quoting my words.

Mr. MANN. I am quoting the words of the report.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is quoting the words of the able gentleman from California, Mr. RAKER. He made up the report.

Mr. MANN. I am quoting the language of the report, and I wondered why it was necessary to assure the House that the Public Lands Committee had given "the fullest consideration" to the subject and when it reached the opinion it was not an ephemeral opinion but it was the "deliberate opinion" of the committee.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is acquainted with the gentleman from California, and he knows that he is a forceful, able, capable gentleman, and that he is a very good linguist as well.

Mr. MANN. I am not disputing that.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I will consume but a little time. The gentleman from Michigan has a right to make an objection, and so has the gentleman from Wisconsin, and is probably bound to make it. But I want to call attention to the proposition of holding off continually the relief of these settlers. The act of 1887 was a forfeiture act of the three and a quarter million acres grant to these railroads. The grant specifically said that if any lands were occupied by the settlers it did not pass under the grant. The Land Office was induced to erroneously issue a patent to the railroads for the whole tract. Ever since then the settlers have been trying to be heard and trying to find some tribunal where they could be heard. At last they have got their nose under the tent, and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] is entitled to great credit for his untiring efforts. If the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Wisconsin will let the matter come before the House, I am not afraid of what the House will do, and I know that both of these gentlemen would be disposed to do full justice.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think it is only fair to a distinguished Member of the House, who is compulsorily called away to attend the sick bed of his sister who is fatally ill, when he makes a request that the bill be passed over for two weeks that that request should be granted?

Mr. FERRIS. Of course, this is not the bill of the gentleman from Michigan; neither is any part of the land grant in his district. I have no fault to find with the gentleman from Wisconsin, who is asked to do a specific thing, and my heart goes out to the gentleman from Michigan; but my heart also goes out to the 300 or 400 old settlers in Louisiana, who not only now but for the last 30 years have been striving to get their cases adjusted. A bill in identically this form passed the House unanimously last session.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; at a time when there were only a few in the House. It was taken up one day late in the afternoon, when the Unanimous Consent Calendar was not under consideration. The gentleman from Louisiana brought it up when only a handful of Members were here, and they were not acquainted with the matter, and it went through.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not agree with the gentleman's history at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. The RECORD will confirm what I say.

Mr. FERRIS. How will the RECORD confirm the number who were here?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman knows that when the baseball games are on, in the latter part of the afternoon, the number of Members in the Chamber is very small.

Mr. FERRIS. We are not all baseball players; the gentleman from Wisconsin may be.

Mr. STAFFORD. "The gentleman from Wisconsin" is somewhat of a "fan," but I usually stay here and know what is going on.

Mr. FERRIS. I know of some gentlemen that I wish would play ball and let some of these bills go through.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman does not overlook the fact that, as a member of the Public Lands Committee, I listened to all the eloquence in the committee; and does he think now that he has any new supply of eloquence that could convert me this afternoon, or make him so hopeful of converting me?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, in response to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], it is not the most brilliant thing that I know of that a man will brace his shoulders against a door and say that because he has the right to render a single objection he can overthrow what would probably be an 80 or 90 per cent vote of the House if the Members had a chance to vote upon it. All that is asked here is simply to consider this bill. It is certainly entitled to that. If the gentleman feels gleeful about the proposition that by a single objection he can defeat a piece of legislation that practically everyone here will be for if they have a chance to vote for it, I assume he has that right. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] will undoubtedly do what he ought to do, and move to suspend the rules and pass this bill, in spite of a single objection. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know why the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], should take so seriously my purpose to do here just what I stated to him I would do; and if permission of the chairman of my committee is necessary, I will secure his permission, although I had not supposed, as a member of that committee, that it was necessary for me to ask the permission of the chairman in order that I may be able to discharge what I, not he, think is my duty. I do not take kindly his attempt here to read to me a lecture as to what is my duty, and I will say to him that I propose to do here what I think is my duty.

I have given study to this bill, fully as much I think I am warranted in saying at this session of Congress, at least, as the gentleman from Oklahoma, and I have my own opinion as to where lie the equities. In my opinion these gentlemen for whom the gentleman from Oklahoma is appealing are nothing but squatters who had opportunity to apply for this land and acquire title in a legal way; but, being only squatters, and the adjacent land being almost worthless, they had no idea of securing title, and they let years go by. The act of 1887 was passed under which they claim right, and they did nothing to acquire any rights, and the act of 1896 was passed which, in my opinion, was a statute of limitations, and under that the Department of Justice, as I understand it, made a search to get all of the worthy claimants they could, and they got about 150 of them into a certain proceeding in the Federal court, and that case is now pending. There was a proper way in which they could get relief, but those who between the year 1887 and 1901, the expiration of the period of limitations, did not proceed in a legal and orderly way come here now and ask Congress, knowing nothing of the facts, and mighty little of the law, to divest of their title other people who bought this land as innocent purchasers, in good faith, at a large figure. We are asked to legislate those proper owners out and put these squatters in. Of course, I think that a little time should be granted to each side in a discussion of this kind, for that is only fair; but I intimated to the gentleman that I would not object to it absolutely to-day; that I would give him a chance to carry it over; but if he prefers, I will make the absolute objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I merely want to make a statement which I think ought to be made before this bill is passed. I approved of the passage of the bill, and now approve it, but the report of the committee on this bill, or what purports to be the report of the committee, I do not think at all correctly states the views of the committee with reference to it. This report which I have read for the first time this morning undertakes to argue the legal rights of these various claimants. I think I was present at every session of the committee, and the committee, I am sure, has not undertaken either in reporting this bill or in any other way to determine those various questions, nor has it expressed any opinion with reference to it. What was sought to be done by this bill was merely to give authority to the Department of the Interior to review all of these questions and apply the law to the case as the department thought it should be applied, and as to whether or not the various statutes of limitations that are in controversy are applicable or not to this case, I am sure the committee never undertook to express any opinion on that question, although in the report of the committee it appears they have attempted to do so.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The report gives an opinion which is poor law, too.

Mr. FERRIS. I think both the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], as well as the other Members of the House, will understand that things get into a report, in argumentative phases, that the committee does not agree with. It is merely the opinion of the man who reports it. I have not read the report.

Mr. LENROOT. I will state to the gentleman that my only purpose in making this statement is that if this bill should eventually pass I would not like the Interior Department to be of the opinion that the Committee on Public Lands was of the opinion that the law was as stated in the report.

Mr. MANN. The report in one place says that a certain opinion is obviously correct, although to a lawyer I should say that it is most obviously incorrect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman prefer that I make the objection and send the bill off the calendar or does he prefer to have it passed over?

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I would very much prefer to consider it now, but my plan is to move to suspend the rules this afternoon and pass this bill. I am very frank to tell the gentleman that. If passing it will prevent that, then the gentleman better object, if he persists in his position.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am giving the gentleman his option as a matter of courtesy to him and not to the bill. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ASWELL. Well, the motion can be made to suspend the rules and pass the bill this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Oh, yes; this proceeding has nothing to do with that. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER IN MONTANA.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6854) permitting the Wolf Point Bridge & Development Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River in the State of Montana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Wolf Point Bridge & Development Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Montana, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, from the north bank thereof in the county of Sheridan, State of Montana, to the south bank thereof in the county of Richland, State of Montana, all in section 22, township 27 north, range 47 east, Montana principal meridian, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "is" and insert the words "its successors and assigns, be and are."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point of order that there is no quorum present. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the point of order. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether the applicant for this privilege is still an outlaw as viewed by the War Department? The report states that last year he purposely defied the War Department in the construction of this bridge. Has he now receded from his outlaw position and desires to come under the fold of the United States Government?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the only question in reference to this bill is whether or not the granting of authority to build a bridge in a community where the commerce desperately needs it will interfere with the dealing by the War Department and the Department of Justice with people who they accuse of having violated the law heretofore? The War Department does not object, as their report shows, to the construction of the bridge. That is all right with them; but they state for the information of the committee and Congress that heretofore a temporary structure was placed in the river in violation of law, without the consent of Congress; and then the department in reporting to Congress express the hope that if we do pass this bill it will legalize the structure which we authorize now. Of course that makes no trouble. If any gentlemen here are disposed to object to the granting of present consent for this construction of this bridge in a community that is absolutely dependent upon it for commerce, because somebody built a temporary structure in that river without authority of Congress last year, I will ask the author of the bill to make a statement and apologize for the conduct of those people and try to show that we ought not to interfere with the granting of this consent. I will refer the gentleman from Wisconsin to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. STOUT].

Mr. STAFFORD. Though I like the gentleman as much, I would prefer to have the former gentleman answer, and the gentleman from Montana can give other information——

Mr. ADAMSON. I will answer anything I know.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman having first-hand acquaintance with the matter——

Mr. ADAMSON. I will give way to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to explain the bill and the details connected with this proposition. Wolf Point is a small town of some 800 or 1,000, located on the north bank of the Missouri River. South of the river there is no market place. It is a thickly settled community with several hundred farmers residing there, and there is only one way that those people can get their produce to market, and that is by crossing the Missouri River. Last year the citizens of Wolf Point, not one or two people, but practically the entire citizenship, made application to the War Department, not having been properly advised, for permission to build a bridge. Of course the department had no authority to grant such permission and advised them that it would be necessary to procure the enactment of a law. Well, I think, without the slightest intention of violating the law, they constructed a temporary bridge across the stream there, a pontoon proposition, to be pulled aside, for the purpose of enabling the farmers on the south side of the river, who otherwise would have to go 40 or 50 miles, to bring their produce across into the city. Their violation is technical, to say the most of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, will the gentleman permit me? Is it proposed under this authorization to erect a permanent structure, not one of a pontoon character?

Mr. STOUT. Well, I really do not know what sort of a structure, but of necessity it has to conform to the specifications laid down by the War Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. I read from the report and I assume it is going to be of a pontoon character.

Mr. STOUT. I am not advised as to the character of the bridge they are going to build, but my judgment is, knowing the circumstances and conditions there, they will build a permanent structure across the river.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume there was some temporary exigency that caused the citizens there to erect this pontoon bridge which conflicted perhaps with the ferriage rights of some private individuals, but I was rather surprised at the language of the late Assistant Secretary of War in his letter to the committee, in the last clause of which he says:

It is suggested that, under the circumstances, some modification of the bill may be desirable to show clearly whether it is the intention of Congress to legalize such structure as may be erected under the provisions of the bill if it becomes a law.

Of course the provisions of this bill only follow the usual form and convey no intimation whatsoever of any dispute or any question as to the legality of the temporary structure.

Mr. STOUT. I am utterly at a loss as to why he put that in.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the gentleman from Montana will either state, or correct me if I do not state it properly, that this is a community affair. The whole people there are interested in it, and they are providing this bridge for the benefit of the community, and do not expect to make any profit out of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform us what was the moving reason for the Assistant Secretary of War using the language in the letter which I have just read?

Mr. ADAMSON. My own opinion is that the river usually freezes up, as I understand, in the winter, and all the traffic occurs in the spring and summer, and Congress was not in session and they could not get consent, so they haggled along with the War Department, and these people just started their pontoon bridge pending negotiations with the War Department. But I have no sort of idea that that entire community intended any contempt of the War Department or Congress or intended to violate the law.

But be that as it may, if any of them are guilty they can be prosecuted despite this bill. The whole community there now asks for this bill in order to erect a lawful structure.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the measure and no further question to ask.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER IN MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5767) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River between Anoka and Hennepin Counties, in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, there being a Senate bill, S. 2497, on the Speaker's table of similar tenor, I ask unanimous consent that it be taken up for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2497, being identical with the House bill, and to pass it in lieu of the House bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Let us have the Senate bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows

Be it enacted, etc., That the Great Northern Railway Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, about 7 miles above the city of Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota, in accordance with the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges across navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the Senate bill in lieu of an identical House bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill H. R. 5767, of similar tenor, was ordered laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. DILLON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill S. 2497 was passed was laid on the table.

ASSETS OF INSOLVENT NATIONAL BANKS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 3575) to amend section 5234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to permit the Comptroller of the Currency to deposit upon interest the assets of insolvent national banks in other national banks of the same or of an adjacent city or town.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Provided, That the Comptroller may, if he deems proper, deposit any of the money so made in any regular Government depositary, or in any national bank either of the city or town in which the insolvent bank was located, or of a city or town as adjacent thereto as practicable; if such deposit is made he shall require the depositary to deposit United States bonds or other satisfactory securities for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the money so deposited. Such depositary shall pay upon such money interest at such rate as the Comptroller may prescribe, not less, however, than 2 per cent per annum upon the average monthly amount of such deposits."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman in charge of the bill make an explanation of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. ROGERS, is the author of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, this bill is to remedy an apparent injustice and an unbusinesslike practice which have prevailed for a good many years. A national bank fails in some city of the United States and a receiver is appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency, who proceeds to collect the assets. As fast as he collects the assets he turns them over to the Treasurer of the United States to the order of the comptroller, and they are retained by the Treasurer of the United States until the receiver has sufficient funds with which to pay a dividend. That may be weeks or months, or, in the case of protracted litigation, even years. The money lies in the Treasury of the United States without drawing a cent of interest, and the depositors are thus penalized in addition to the penalty which frequently follows as the result of the bank ultimately proving insolvent. Further, the money which formed the assets of the national bank in question is taken out of the community just at a time when the community needs its funds most. Stringency in the financial resources of the city or town and consequent additional failures often result.

This bill has the support of Secretary McAdoo, and has been indorsed in substance in the past by Comptrollers of the Currency in their annual reports.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says this money is now deposited in the Treasury and lies there. In what account is it carried?

Mr. ROGERS. It is carried to the account of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. MANN. Where is the money in the Treasury in the daily Treasury balance?

Mr. ROGERS. That I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Well, if money be deposited in the Treasury now, of course the Secretary of the Treasury has authority to deposit that money in any national bank that he chooses, has he not?

Mr. ROGERS. The Comptroller of the Currency has written me that he did not; that the money lay in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well; the Secretary of the Treasury has authority to deposit money in national banks. He might not deposit a special fund for that purpose. Possibly he could not turn the interest that is collected over to the receiver of the bank.

Mr. ROGERS. The Comptroller of the Currency wrote me that in order to accomplish the two purposes which this bill seeks to accomplish a change in the law would be necessary.

Mr. MANN. The statements are not exactly alike. But I receive letters occasionally, and I received one this morning, and this letter was from an intelligent man in the North, stating that the Government had collected a very large amount of illegal cotton tax, which was now lying in the Treasury. Of course, the money was collected, but it is not lying in the Treasury; the lying is outside.

Mr. ROGERS. But, even if the money were to draw interest, that interest would not inure to the benefit of the depositors of the national bank.

Mr. MANN. Now, the gentleman gives as a reason if a national bank in a small city fails that to take the money out of the city would be a great detriment to the community. But there are a great many cities which have only one national bank, but which have other banks, namely, State banks. Why does the proposition come to deposit this money in a national bank which in the ordinary case where it would make any difference means that the money will be taken out of that city and deposited in a national bank in another city? In a large city this would not amount to anything one way or another, so far as the money is concerned.

Mr. ROGERS. I followed that course because of the suggestion of the Comptroller of the Currency. Of course, I desired to draft a measure which would meet the approval of the comptroller and the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not know whether they would approve, for their part, such a suggestion as the gentleman has in mind. I suppose their theory may be that there is an additional measure of security in the case of deposits in a national bank over and above that which results in the case of money deposited in a State bank.

Mr. MANN. The statement is "United States bonds or other satisfactory security."

Mr. ROGERS. Is it not possible that their theory is that they have a direct personal control over national banks which is necessarily lacking over State banks?

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, I know why they do not approve the deposit of money in banks other than national banks. It is because they are seeking to use force in every way they can to compel the banks—State banks and trust companies—to come into the Federal Reserve System. Every place they can they knock. "Knock," the most offensive term, is the proper term to apply. They knock every effort made to do anything or deposit money in a State bank or trust company.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I have not the floor.

Mr. ROGERS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman says a great many cities have only one national bank, but this would not make any difference in a large city. There are many cities of 10,000 inhabitants and more that have two or three national banks, and some have even four or five.

Mr. MANN. It would help those. But that is no reason for not helping a city that has only one national bank.

Mr. PLATT. There may be other national banks in towns within a few miles.

Mr. MANN. It would be no benefit to one city to have money taken out of one bank and deposited several miles away in another city.

Mr. PLATT. In my district national banks are to be found every 5 or 10 miles.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman represents a community where there is a thick population, and this bill would not make much difference there anyhow.

Mr. PLATT. I think it would.

Mr. MANN. The purpose of this bill is to take care of those regions of the country that are more sparsely settled, where it is difficult to obtain ready money. In the gentleman's locality any bank in the State can get all the money it wants in New York City at a moment's notice if it has the security.

Mr. ROGERS. This would help out the depositors in earning money while the receivership is continuing.

Mr. MANN. It will not help very much.

Mr. PLATT. I do not maintain that the bill is of much consequence to my district, in which there has been no bank failure for many years, in my own town none since 1829.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I am sure no bank would have the temerity to fail during the service on the Committee on Banking and Currency of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I feel it would not be wise for the national banking system to authorize deposits of funds in the State banks over which the Federal Government has no control or inspection. I believe that is the reason for the limitation in the bill under consideration.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that we have in recent years authorized the deposits of national funds in State banks.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Under proper security.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and proper security is provided here.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Even though that may be so, I do not believe it is good policy.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is a question. When we passed the bill there was no one here who raised any dissent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the author of the bill to the phraseology he has used in the bill. I notice that in the second line of the proviso he uses the same phraseology that is in the original section providing for the deposit of funds "so made," which were the result of the sale by the receiver of the property, but in the former part of the original section the language authorizes the receiver receiving the deposits and other funds which are not required to be sold. I wish to ask the gentleman whether, under a strict construction of his proviso, it would be limited only to those funds which accrue from the sale of the real property and the personal property, and not at all to the cash and deposits that come into the receiver's hands as of course. I direct the gentleman's attention specifically to the last sentence of the present law:

Such receiver shall pay over all money so made to the Treasurer of the United States.

"So made," referring to the funds received from the sale of real and personal property, and not referring to the deposits of money in the bank. Now, in his proviso the gentleman uses this language:

Provided, That the comptroller may, if he deems proper, deposit any of the money so made—and if it is to be construed together, it will relate only to the money accruing from the sale of real and personal property and not to the funds.

Mr. ROGERS. I think the gentleman ought to take the sentence as a whole as it stands in the present law. The beginning of that sentence reads in part as follows:

Such receiver shall take possession of the assets of every description of such association, collect all debts, dues, and claims belonging to it, and may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts—

And so forth.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Then it goes on to deal with the physical assets, as the gentleman says.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but the gentleman in his proviso uses the same language as in the last sentence, "so made," and I question whether that covers the assets, such as the funds on deposit or coming into his hands on the order of the court.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin understand, as a matter of fact, that where a national bank fails and a receiver is appointed all the money in the bank is deposited in the Treasury of the United States at Washington?

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the purpose of this was to enable the receiver to deposit such funds in a local bank.

Mr. MANN. I know the gentleman may have received that impression, both from the report and from the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], but I am sure that neither one of them intended to convey that impression. That certainly is not the case. The money is not sent to Washington.

Mr. STAFFORD. I gained that from the reading of the report, that the assets of the bank were immediately transferred to Washington.

Mr. MANN. We have had national banks fail in the city of Chicago for ten or twenty million dollars, but with a very large amount of money on hand. But that money is not sent to Washington.

Mr. STAFFORD. But I assume it is the purpose of that proviso to grant authority to the receiver to deposit not only the funds accruing from the sale of personal and real estate and other assets, but also the funds on deposit.

Mr. ROGERS. To authorize the Comptroller to do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. To authorize the Comptroller to give authority to the receiver to do that.

Mr. ROGERS. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. My point is that I think the gentleman's amendment is not broad enough, and that he should insert some broader language.

Mr. ROGERS. The Treasury Department has repeatedly ruled that it is this last sentence of the present section which stands in the way of such a course as my amendment is intended to permit, and therefore the Treasury Department has stated that such an amendment as I am now proposing will cure all the previous difficulties.

Mr. STAFFORD. But does the gentleman realize that he is using the same identical language in his proviso that is carried in the last section of the original law, and that refers only to funds resulting from the sale of personal and real estate, and therefore in his proviso he makes no provision whatsoever for the deposits that are not the result of the sale of real and personal property? A slight amendment would cure all that.

Mr. ROGERS. I question whether an amendment is necessary, because this is the section which authorizes the receiver to take possession of all assets of the national bank the solvency of which is in question. If that is true, it would seem that an amendment which is so phrased as to refer back to the rest of the section in its present form would be broad enough to include every kind of an asset, including the deposits which the gentleman mentions.

Mr. STAFFORD. Ah, but the gentleman follows in his proviso the sentence that relates to the funds resulting from the sale of personal and real property.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman from Wisconsin will note that that is the only limitation in the law now, and he simply wants to remove that limitation.

Mr. STAFFORD. But as to all the other funds, has the Comptroller of the Currency now the authority to deposit those funds in the local national banks, or in such other banks as he sees fit, or in the Treasury of the United States? If such is the fact——

Mr. MANN. This proviso removes all the limitation that there now is, whatever it may be.

Mr. ROGERS. That is the opinion of the Treasury Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it is a fact, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] assert, then there is no reason for pressing my suggestion.

Mr. WINGO. Under the present law, whenever the receiver takes charge of the assets of a defunct bank the Comptroller of the Treasury can direct him what to do with them, subject to one limitation of the law, which is contained in the last sentence of the section sought to be amended. Now, if you amend the law as proposed by the bill under consideration, you will remove that one limitation, and the effect of it will be that the comptroller can direct all of the assets, including the funds received from the sale of real and personal property, to be deposited at interest in national banks. That will be the effect of it, according to my understanding and the understanding of the committee. For that reason we reported the bill unanimously.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, when I read the bill and the report I was under the impression that the comptroller to-day is restricted as to all of the funds.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. But under the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] I see that my criticism is not well founded. Therefore I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. WINGO. Under the law at present the comptroller can direct the disposition of the funds on hand, but as to funds which are received from the sale of property there is a limitation. This will remove that limitation and put all the funds under the direction of the comptroller.

Mr. ROGERS. In further response to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], I think it is fair to say that the practice of the Treasury Department and of the comptroller to-day is such that, even as to the funds which he mentions, a desirable change will be achieved, because this proposed amendment will put all assets on the same basis and will permit the Comptroller of the Currency to put all the funds upon interest in the particular community, whereas to-day he is putting no funds whatsoever at interest, there or elsewhere.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will agree that in reading the report referring to the defunct Pittsburgh bank and the $14,000,000 out on deposit anyone might very readily get the impression that those funds were taken out of the local community by reason of this section, of which revision is suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORTON. What is the gentleman's understanding as to what is done with the cash that may be on deposit in the case of the failure of a national bank? For instance, say a national bank fails, having on hand cash amounting to $1,000,000. This cash is taken in charge by the receiver. What is done with that $1,000,000 in cash under existing law?

Mr. ROGERS. As I understand it, there are two things that are done. Part of the fund is retained in the vaults of the institution, and part of it is sent on to Washington and put into the Treasury of the United States. The proportion which is put in each place varies, of course, according to the exigencies of the particular situation.

Mr. NORTON. I understood the gentleman from Arkansas to state, in substance, that in a case of that kind the cash deposits might be placed by the receiver in banks in the town in which the bank failed, and that section 5234 of the Revised Statutes, the present law, did not restrict the depositing of cash assets of a bank that had failed.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will permit me, it has been some time since I looked up this matter, and we have had no experience in my particular community with reference to that question, and so I am not sure; but as I understand the law, when the receiver takes charge of the assets, including the cash, he handles it all under the direction of the comptroller. Now, my recollection is, and the information furnished to the committee in the last Congress when we were considering the present bill was, that the receiver would keep in his immediate possession in the vaults of the defunct bank such funds as he and the comptroller thought were necessary. The remainder of the funds must under the law be deposited in the name of the Treasurer of the United States in a Government depository; but the law as it stands now puts a limitation on the funds that he gets from the sale of real estate and other assets. I understand that the cash on hand is handled by the receiver, subject to the direction of the comptroller, and that he follows the law and the directions of the comptroller and deposits the funds in the name of the Treasurer of the United States in a Government depository. That is my understanding of the information that came to the committee at the time of the consideration of the bill. Personally I have never had occasion to observe in particular the handling of the funds of any defunct bank.

Mr. NORTON. It has occurred to me that the gentleman was endeavoring to make a distinction between money received from the sale of property and the cash in the vaults at the time of the failure.

Mr. WINGO. I think there is; but the comptroller has repeatedly recommended a change. There is a limitation of law and a distinction with reference to the funds he takes in his possession when he takes charge and the funds that he gets by reason of the sale of property, and there should be no difference in the control of the two by the department. The object of this bill, I was informed, is to remove that limitation and to require payment of interest on funds deposited by the receiver.

Mr. ROGERS. It is important to add, as to the practical effect of the bill, that to-day, in case of a receivership of a national bank, there is no provision for interest as to any of the funds which are collected. This being so, the depositor does not care what the disposition or location of the fund is; he is kept out of his interest just the same, wherever it goes.

Mr. NORTON. I think that is a correct statement. I do not think there is any difference in handling the cash or the other funds received from the sale of property of a defunct national bank. If the funds of a national bank that has failed are deposited in any other bank, the receiver now would be held liable under his bond for such funds. That is the practical part of it. Would the gentleman from Massachusetts have any objection to an amendment providing that the funds might be deposited in a State bank as well as a National bank?

Mr. ROGERS. Only this. This bill has met with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency; and, while I should not personally object to it, I am not quite sure that there is not some objection that I do not know about, not being an expert in such matters. I certainly shall not oppose any amendment of that kind.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman seems to concede the suggestion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] that we would discriminate in such matters in favor of national banks against the State banks. Does the gentleman think that should be done in a large community, considering the number of State banks providing additional means of security over the national banking system?

Mr. ROGERS. I did not mean to concede the suggestion. I said the bill in this form had been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, and that I therefore hesitated to adopt any material change without knowledge of their attitude toward it.

Mr. SLOAN. But we do the legislating, do we not?

Mr. ROGERS. Precisely.

Mr. SLOAN. And we are not obliged to follow the executive department.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman will permit me, I think, upon reflection, that the suggested change ought to be wholesome because, as the gentleman from Illinois said, there is abundant provision for security which must be exchanged for any such deposit in any bank.

Mr. SLOAN. In many counties in my State there are no national banks, and they are becoming less for a number of reasons, one of which is that the State banks provide for additional security for depositors beyond that provided by the national banking system, and if that is the case it does not seem fair to the State banking institutions that the Government should discriminate in the deposits of its funds. Further, I would suggest that this bill apparently is in the interest of the depositors, and being vouched for by the Secretary of the Treasury as he emphasizes it, does not the gentleman think that in the interest of depositors under the national banking system it would be salutary legislation to have a system either compulsory or voluntary guaranteeing bank deposits as they do in some States? In some States it is compulsory, and in others they authorize an orginization or association for guaranteeing bank deposits, both of which would materially strengthen the depositors, so that if there is a failure it would be bankers and others that would be interested, but the depositors would draw the funds and draw them promptly.

Mr. ROGERS. I would refer that question respectfully to the Committee on Banking and Currency and keep it comfortably clear of this particular measure.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] suggests that there is a discrimination. There is no discrimination in this proposed bill. I am opposed to any discrimination against the State banks, as is the gentleman from Nebraska, but I think the present law is such if you strike out the word "national," in line 8 of the bill, the present law would require these deposits to be made in the national banks on account of the provisions that were made in the act revising the banking and currency law. Of course it is contended by those who procured the passage of the banking and currency act that the United States Government should not undertake to deposit any funds under its control in any institution except one chartered by it. So I should think if you cut out the word "national" you would still be confronted by the provision on the statute books which would require the comptroller to deposit the funds in a national bank.

It is not intended by this bill to make any discrimination; it is following the general law. The truth of the thing is, and the whole milk in the coconut is, although it goes about it in a roundabout way, the whole object is to require interest to be paid on the deposit of the funds held by the receiver of a national bank. That is the real purpose of the act and the only effect it will have.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am afraid my distinguished friend from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] has misinterpreted my statement. I would be the last one to stand for discrimination against a State bank. What I meant to convey was the fact that this is a fund belonging to a national bank, belonging to the national banking system, and that there is no reason for turning it over to a State bank that is entirely under another jurisdiction and belonging to another system. If this was a Government fund I should say the State banks should be treated the same as a national bank; but it is a fund that belongs to the national banking system, and it should not be turned over to another system where there is no inspection by the National Government and it is not under the control of the Federal Government.

Mr. SLOAN. While it may have started in a system belonging to the national banks, it is a fund belonging to the local depositors, and has no relation to the funds of a national bank. If I understand the scope of the bill, it is simply taking care of the money belonging to the depositors, and it ought to be in the community where it belongs.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. But that depositor saw fit to patronize the national banking system, and the Government should not step in and turn it over to the State banking system. It should be continued in the system in which it started.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I desire to offer, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "any," insert the words "state or."

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I offer will in its effect permit the comptroller to place these funds in any State bank or in any National bank. I can not think of any good reason why the comptroller should not place these funds in a State bank in a town in which a National bank may have failed, providing sufficient security for the deposits be given to the Federal Government by the State bank. I do not believe we should longer proceed in this legislative body to enact legislation that will discriminate against the State banks of the country. One of the most able and distinguished bankers in the State of Minnesota, a man who has charge of one of the largest banking institutions in that State, told me a few months ago that the Secretary of the Treasury while on a trip to the Pan Pacific International Exposition, and while incidentally making political speeches through the Western States, in going through the State of Montana spoke on the banking situation of the country in one of the largest cities of Montana. He was the guest while in this city of one of the officers and directors of one of the largest and strongest State banks in Montana. The banker gathered together the business men of the city at a large banquet to do honor to the Secretary of the Treasury, as the son-in-law of President Wilson, and as his chief representative in the Cabinet. In the course of the evening at this banquet Secretary McAdoo stated, so my informant told me, that he believed every State bank of the country should join the Federal reserve system, and further made the startling statement that he did not consider it safe for depositors to place their money in State banks. You can probably imagine how such a statement was received by the gathering that evening.

The Minnesota banker to whom I talked told me that those attending the banquet were surprised as they never had been in their life before. They had never imagined, he said, that a man occupying the high position occupied by Mr. McAdoo would make any such an outrageous statement concerning the State banking institutions of the country. My study of this question leads me to believe that in any further banking legislation we may enact we should not enact provisions of law such as are proposed by this bill. There is no good reason why we should deliberately discriminate against State banks.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it not a fact that of all the 12 regional banks of the country only a few have paid expenses during the last year, and that only one of them has paid a dividend, and that into such organizations as that the Secretary of the Treasury is trying to drive the State banks of the country to put their money by the millions, into cold storage?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman in reply that I do not know as to whether the Federal reserve banks have been largely profitable in dividends or not. Whether they have or not, I am firmly convinced that the Federal reserve banking system is a good one and that it is rendering a splendid and valuable service to the commercial banking business of the country, and will continue to render such service. But because the Federal Reserve System has proven successful or otherwise is not any reason why we should enact legislation discriminating against the State banks of the country.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment pending will be adopted, for practical reasons. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has already suggested an illustration that will show the practical necessity for the amendment that is now pending, and that is this: Suppose in a small community where there are only two banks, one a State bank and the other a national bank, which is frequently the case in towns of from one to two or three thousand people, and suppose the national bank should fail. If the amendment offered be adopted, then if in the opinion of the comptroller the State bank that is left as the only bank in that community can give proper security, the funds that really belong to the community could be kept in it and deposited in the State bank. Of course if it were not a safe institution, if it could not give the proper security, the comptroller would not be required to deposit the money there, but he should be permitted to keep those funds in the local community as far as possible. For that reason I hope the amendment will be adopted.

With reference to the statement just made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] respecting the Federal reserve act, I fear that he misconceived entirely the philosophy of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. In a moment. I do not know how he feels about it, but for one when I voted for that act I did not think that this Congress was undertaking to establish profit-making institutions throughout the country. I thought that the object of establishing Federal reserve banks was to mobilize the reserves of each particular part of the United States in districts, so as to have them readily available when banks in the districts needed additional currency, and that in order to do that, and in order to prevent an abuse of the privileges and rediscount provisions of the act, it was highly necessary that all temptations to make profits should be removed from those who held stock in those institutions, and that they should be used for one purpose, and that that was for the legitimate purpose of meeting the needs of the banks in their particular territories by reason of the necessity for additional currency or for an additional volume of money in time of panic. I now yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman is more familiar with the terms of this act than I, but is it not a fact that it provides a maximum dividend of 6 per cent from the reserve banks, and every member bank which enters the system is entitled under the law to expect a profit from its investment, not exceeding 6 per cent?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; but the gentleman, I think, has a wrong conception there. The 6 per cent provision was not intended to be put in to induce any bank to join the system, but was put in there with the deliberate intent to limit its earnings so that profit making could not be the spirit that would control and govern the operations of the institution. Now, the gentleman suggested something about State banks. I am not one of those who believe State banks should be outlawed simply because they will not go under the Federal Reserve System. Now, in a good many small communities of the country, by virtue of their local conditions, the State banks can more nearly meet the requirements of the community than a national bank. I know of a great many communities where a bank with five or ten thousand dollars capital stock can meet the needs of its community. I know in my State the State banking institutions are just as sound and safe as the national banking institutions. As a matter of fact, the State bankers complain that the examinations of the State banks of my State are more rigid and thereby bring a greater amount of security to the State than the examinations of the national-bank examiners. However, I am glad to say I believe the examinations of both the State and National banks are very well carried on in this country at this time, and I do not believe there should be any rivalry between the two, or that there should be any discrimination between the two in legislation at all.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will yield.

Mr. BENNET. I saw a statement in the paper the other day—I do not know as to its accuracy, and I want to ask the gentleman purely for information—that there was more money on deposit in the New York banks, in my city, by banks outside of New York City than there was at the time the Federal reserve bank act passed. Has the gentleman looked into that question at all?

Mr. WINGO. I have not looked into that question, but I doubt not that statement is true, and I suspect it is also true that there is more money on deposit in all the banks in all parts of the country in all the cities than there was at the time the act was enacted.

Mr. BENNET. Has the gentleman looked into the question as to the proportion of the deposits in the banks of New York from outside?

Mr. WINGO. No; I have not; but I have the idea—it would be just a mere assumption upon my part—that under the condition which has existed for the last 12 or 18 months there would naturally be a congestion of funds in New York City, because New York City practically is our outlet financially for our export and import business.

Mr. BENNET. Was not one of the purposes of the Federal reserve banking act to keep the funds of the various localities in the locality where apparently they first originated?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; that was one of the prime purposes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask for three minutes more so that I may be able to answer questions of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to speak for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BENNET. Then if it is a fact that the deposits in the New York banks of New York City have very largely increased, has there been a partial failure on the part of the Federal reserve banking act or was that foreseen when the act was passed?

Mr. WINGO. No; I should not think that anyone could have foreseen the extraordinary conditions which have existed for the past 12 or 18 months, and to be frank with the gentleman I do not believe that the Federal reserve system has been given a sufficient test as to determine whether or not it is going to be a proper solution of the problem which it was contended it solved. However, it is my candid judgment that the act is going to be a better act than some of us thought it would be at the time we voted for it. I am frank to say to the gentleman I voted for the act with considerable reluctance on account of some of the provisions in it, but I believe it is the part of wisdom always to give everything a fair trial; and in my candid judgment the Federal reserve act is going to demonstrate it is a great deal better than I ever thought it would be when it was created.

Mr. BENNET. At any rate, the fact is it has not succeeded in keeping the money in the place where the money originated?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, the gentleman misunderstands me. I think it has served the purpose. The fact that by reason of extraordinary conditions that have existed and the extraordinary volume of the business of the country that has been carried on through the port of New York and thereby an abnormal amount of funds has been deposited in New York, does not mean that the reserve fund of member banks scattered over the country has not been kept in the reserve banks. However, bankers being human, are more or less influenced by the fact they make profit on the money they send to New York, and so far they have not made any large profit on the money they have placed in the reserve banks.

I will say to the gentleman that some of the bankers have resented some of the rulings and regulations that have been made by the Federal Reserve Board. Whether the complaints of the banks as to this are just I shall not say. I have an idea, though, that the Federal Reserve Board naturally thought that they ought to be cautious in the beginning, and I have not taken the time to see whether the critcism of those rulings and regulations was just or not. At present these and other things have retarded the development of the system fully by keeping the State banks from going into the system by reason of what they thought were some onerous regulations to which they would be subjected were they to join, but I think the board is acting honestly and making an effort to be both cautious and just.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman wish recognition?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. In reply to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], I could state to him an additional reason for money being deposited in New York by banks all over the country. There is a restriction on country banks borrowing there that is not placed by the Federal Reserve Board. In nearly all of the outlying banks they are borrowers for a certain percentage of the year, while for a part of the time they are not borrowers. Many banks carry accounts in New York that they may become borrowers and thereby extend additional credit to their depositors. The system in New York is that in order to get the money they need, and especially in agricultural communities, for the purpose of carrying on their business, they must maintain during the period of time when they have a high-water mark in their deposits deposits in New York which can be utilized by New York in other parts of the country in order to prevent a scarcity of money there, and these deposits will always be carried in New York, no matter how many national reserve banks there are. The so-called New York system is not a New York system in fact, for it is a system composed of the greatest banking brains in America. They are men from all over the United States. They are put into the well-recognized New York banking institutions as having a thorough knowledge of all the banking conditions in this country, and with an intention to be fair to the financial interests all over this country. They run their banking business without regard to politics, and in my opinion they have played a great part in the development of this country. I have always found them absolutely fair, and they have my absolute respect in dealing with them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was it not charged when the Federal reserve act was under consideration in the House that New York was the center of the money power of the United States?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Unquestionably.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that New York unduly gathered together and concentrated the money of the people of the United States?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I think it was so charged.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that New York, after the operation of two years of the Federal reserve act, is still the center of the money power?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Unquestionably.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And there has been no change in the matter of New York's influence over the money of the country?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I do not see, so far as my experience in that line is concerned and information that I have gathered, that New York has lost any of its power. The truth of the matter is that I like the way that New York runs its banks and I do not like the way some other cities do. Having deposits from the North and South and East and West, and having trained experts who are familiar with the different conditions existing in different parts of the country, they can take deposits from the South, we will say, at the time it sells its cotton, and lend it in the West. Then when we plant our crops in the South and need loans money is loaned from New York that is there deposited from other sections. In other words, New York has utilized the money of the United States for extending credit throughout the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. New York has simply adjusted itself to the Federal reserve act, and has as much business to do as it ever did?

Mr. RAGSDALE. More than it ever did before. When the Federal reserve act was first prepared the time limit was 45 days for rediscount privileges, and it was only after a bitter struggle beginning in the committee and carried into the caucus that the time for rediscounts was extended to 90 days and warehouse receipts allowed to be used as a basis for credit. The original Glass bill denied privileges to our banks and borrowers that New York banks had always permitted, and I often pointed to them in that fight as an argument for permitting amendments. New York never limited the South to six months, but this House refused six months' rediscount privilege until the Senator from South Carolina took it up anew in the Senate and there succeeded in extending the time to six months.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, although the author of this bill, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], has made most of the argument for it, I made the report and am supposed to be in charge of it. I want to say that the Committee on Banking and Currency hopes that this amendment will not be adopted. If it is adopted, it will be in direct conflict with the present law and will endanger the bill, which, if it should pass, would doubtless meet the presidential veto on the same grounds that the President vetoed the postal savings bill. The Federal reserve act says, among other things:

> No public funds of the Philippine Islands, or of the postal savings, or any Government funds shall be deposited in the continental United States in any bank not belonging to the system established by this act.

Now, I should have no great objection to striking out the word "national." That would not make much difference; but to put the words "State or National" in here will undoubtedly endanger the bill. I hope the amendment will not be carried.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I rise to extend my thanks to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] for the speech that he has just made. It is one of the fairest speeches in relation to the business of the city of New York that I have ever heard made. While I have no criticism to make of the House in general, yet I think I can say truthfully and accurately that praise of the city of New York is not so common here from outside of the city of New York that we can afford to let any of it pass without notice. What the gentleman said about our banking system in New York, of course, all of us from New York believe to be correct. I was very glad to hear it coming from one outside the State who has had dealings with our banks.

Now, as to the reason why the money comes to the banks in New York and other financial centers rather than to the Federal reserve cities, there is some criticism of the Federal Reserve Board. Out in a country village in New Jersey not long since I was talking with the country banker as to where he deposited his money, and he gave me the name of a bank in New York City where he deposited. I said, "Why do you not deposit in the Federal reserve bank?" At that time his Federal reserve bank was in Philadelphia. He said, "I would like to, but here is the situation: We know everybody that we loan money to out in the country. We know that they will pay. We know in a general way what their assets are, and we very rarely suffer a loss.

"If we send our paper to New York City they loan us money on it. If we send it to Philadelphia to be rediscounted we have got to send to a local manufacturer or business man here and have that man go into an inventory of everything that he has"; and, he said, "The truth and the fact is that a country banker can not do business in that way. The people all know us and call us by our first names, and we know all of them and call all of them by their first names, and they would regard it as an insult and it would cause trouble in the community if we would try to get from the men the statements we must have in order to rediscount the paper."

I suppose that is one of the unavoidable incidents of the Government attempting to do a banking business, but inasmuch as the subject is up, I throw that observation into the general discussion for whatever it may be worth.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Do I understand the gentleman to be an opponent of the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. BENNET. No, sir; I want to see it work out.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman believes it is a wise system and simply believes that it should be regulated?

Mr. BENNET. Yes; that is all.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PLATT. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 5.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROGERS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER, LANSING, IOWA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10238) granting the consent of Congress to the Interstate Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Interstate Bridge Co. and its successors and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near Lansing, in the county of Allamakee, in the State of Iowa, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With a committee amendment as follows:

On page 1, line 7, strike out the word "navigations" and insert "navigation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, where is this bridge?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is between Wisconsin and Iowa. It is halfway between La Crosse and Prairie du Chien. There is no other bridge for a distance of 120 miles between Dubuque and Prairie du Chien.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if the company mentioned here is all ready to go ahead with the building of the bridge?

Mr. HAUGEN. I regret to say that I am not advised as to that. I asked for that information somewhat in detail, as to the corporation, but I have not the data at hand at the present time. But I understand a survey is being made by parties in Wisconsin, and that the work is now contemplated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it proposed to be a railroad bridge as well as a highway bridge?

Mr. HAUGEN. No. I understand it is a highway bridge, for the special convenience of the people on the Wisconsin and Iowa side.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

MINERALS ON SITE OF POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT CALUMET, MICH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10487) reserving or excepting all ores or minerals on the lands, with the right of mining the same, on the site of the proposed post-office building at Calumet, Mich.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provision of the public building act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats., p. 878), which authorizes the acquisition of a suitable site for the post office at Calumet, Mich., be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, accept a title which reserves or excepts all ores or minerals on the lands, with the right of mining the same."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JAMES, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AQUEDUCT BRIDGE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 759) to provide for the removal of what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in place thereof.

The bill was read, with the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed a bridge across the Potomac River at or near what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge, replacing said bridge with a substantial structure, at a cost of not more than $1,000,000.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is further authorized, if in his judgment it should be necessary, to acquire any lands, easements, rights, or property on each side of the Potomac River, by purchase or condemnation, as may be desired for the construction of said bridge and the approaches thereto.

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is further authorized to make such contract for the removal of the present bridge and for the sale thereof as in his discretion may be proper, and to cover the proceeds of such sale, if any, into the Treasury of the United States.

"SEC. 4. That in the discharge of his duties hereunder the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to employ the services of such engineers and other persons as he shall determine to be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 5. That the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of securing proper plans and for the payment of any lands, easements, rights, or property, and for the removal of the present structure, and immediately to commence the construction of said bridge and the approaches thereto.

"SEC. 6. That the said bridge shall be used as a highway for traffic, and for gas and water mains, power, telegraph and telephone wires or cables upon such conditions as may from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the Washington & Old Dominion Railway, now using the Aqueduct Bridge, shall be permitted, with the approval of the Secretary of War, to change its location so as to cross with a double track the new bridge and approaches herein provided for, and to connect its railway, located in Alexandria County, Va., and in the District of Columbia with the tracks of said new bridge; and that all plans for such change are to be approved by the Secretary of war: And provided further, That a standard system of electric propulsion shall be installed by said railway on said new bridge, and no dynamo furnishing power to this portion of the road and said railway shall be in any manner connected with the ground, and that the cost of paving and maintaining in good condition between the tracks and 2 feet outside thereof shall be paid by said railway: And provided further, That any electric railway chartered or that may hereafter be chartered by Congress shall have the right to cross said new bridge upon terms mutually agreed upon with the said Washington & Old Dominion Railway, or in case of disagreement, upon terms determined by the Secretary of War, who is hereby authorized and directed to hear the interested parties and to fix the terms of joint trackage. And all electric railways, including the said Washington & Old Dominion Railway, using said new bridge shall, in addition to taxes and other charges prescribed by charter, pay monthly into the Treasury of the United States the sum of one-half of 1 cent for each passenger transported each way over said new bridge, and just and reasonable rates or charges on all freight transported thereon, and of these sums, when paid into the Treasury, one-half shall be credited to the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 7. That one-half of the entire expense of constructing said bridge, and its maintenance when constructed, including the amount appropriated in section 5 of this act, shall be paid by the District of Columbia, and shall be set aside and deducted by the Secretary of the Treasury from any funds in the Treasury belonging to the District of Columbia and not otherwise appropriated.

"SEC. 8. That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of maintaining and repairing the present Aqueduct Bridge until the new bridge herein provided for is completed."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask a question of the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Noticing that there is no provision in this bill that the State of Virginia shall contribute a part of the cost of its construction, I will ask the gentleman, Does not the south end of this bridge reach over into Alexandria County, Va., and is not a very considerable benefit derived from this bridge by the State of Virginia?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will state in answer to the gentleman's question that I suppose it is well known that people travel from the District into Virginia and from certain portions of Virginia into the District of Columbia, and a great many of them use the present bridge.

Mr. CARLIN. It is on Government land.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Was this matter brought to the attention of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as to whether or not the State of Virginia ought to contribute to the construction of the bridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. The subject was mentioned several times in the committee, and the chairman failed to discover any evidence of an inclination on the part of the State of Virginia to contribute. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Can the chairman of the committee tell me whether or not there has been any contribution on the part of the State of Virginia to the construction of any other bridges between the District of Columbia and the State of Virginia?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not remember that any such has ever been brought to the attention of the chairman.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, as the expression of one Member of the House, I am constrained to believe that unless there is some reason that I have not heard advanced, the Commonwealth of Virginia ought to contribute to the construction of these bridges spanning the Potomac River between the District of Columbia and the State of Virginia, for the reason that the inhabitants of the State derive a very considerable benefit from the construction of these bridges, which give them access to the markets in Washington that they would not otherwise have; and as they derive so large a benefit, it has occurred to me that they ought to participate in the expense of the construction.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, I will supplement my answer to his question by saying that the distinguished author of this bill, our amiable and patriotic colleague, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN], is virtuously indignant at even the suggestion of putting burdens on his constituents over in Alexandria County, and he has some sympathy for the rest of the State. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to the fact that the approaches and abutments of this proposed bridge will be entirely on property owned by the United States Government, and no part of it will be under the control of the State of Virginia. If Congress would give to Virginia the control over the bridge, or any part of it, I believe it would be a very easy matter to secure its construction, and it would be still easier if Congress would pay to Virginia the debt that the Government owes to that State. If that were done, we would be glad to build the bridge and present it to the people.

Mr. ADAMSON. I object to considering any plea of set-off here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CARLIN. I mention that so that my friend may be informed that this bridge will not rest upon Virginia soil.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman from Virginia, however, does not set up the plea that this bridge is not used largely by the population of Alexandria County, Va., and he does not deny that they derive a very considerable benefit from it.

Mr. CARLIN. I was going to say to the gentleman, in connection with that, that this bridge is used by the people of the entire United States. It is the bridge that leads to Fort Myer, which is owned by the Government, and to the National Cemetery at Arlington; and it would be hardly fair to expect the State of Virginia to build a bridge for the use of the entire Nation. Virginia has no control over the bridge, and her citizens use it the same as citizens of other States have the right to use it. They may use it with more frequency, and more of them may use it in the course of the year, perhaps, than those of other States, but I doubt it. My own opinion is that a greater number of people from other States of the Union use that bridge in the course of a year than do the citizens of Virginia.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, in this connection, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] speaks of the use of this bridge by the entire population of the United States, and as he says that it is a connecting link between the Capital of the Nation and the national cemetery and Fort Myer, I am wondering if the building of this new bridge, to cost $1,000,000, will lessen the pressure upon the Treasury of the United States for another scheme that he has—of building a memorial bridge to cross the Potomac River at another place.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have always made it a point never to cross a bridge until I get to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It may be some time before the gentleman crosses the memorial bridge.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to interrupt my friends to say that they are broadening this inquiry very much; and I also wish to seek to compose the differences between them by suggesting to my friend from Virginia, who says that the State of Virginia has no interest in the bridge, that we are willing to pay to Virginia a part of the rent if she will help pay the cost.

Mr. CARLIN. I regret that that plan is not proposed in this bill, so that we might consider it here; but the bill as drawn, meeting with the approval of the committee, provides for the payment partially by the District of Columbia and partially by the Federal Government. I think that is based upon two reasons. We find that the present method of payment meets with the approval of the Secretary of War, who recommends it, and also meets with the approval of the District Commissioners, who are the representatives of the district government. They approve the proposition that the District of Columbia shall pay a part of the cost of the bridge. I have never heard it seriously suggested until now that the State of Virginia ought to be expected to build the bridge and turn it over to the Federal Government after it is built.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia one question. What is the amount of the limit of cost of the construction of this bridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. One million dollars.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Is it limited to that?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does this bill provide that there shall be that ordinary supervision which is provided for in the general bridge act, protecting the interests of navigation?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is left entirely in the control of the Secretary of War. This is not the obstruction of a stream by private capital. It is something to be done by the Government itself. The Government retains the entire control over this bridge in every respect, as well as paying a part of the cost of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has not incorporated in this bill any provision that the bridge shall be subject to the provisions of the general bridge act.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is not done where the Government puts up the structure and has absolute control of it; it is assumed that the Secretary of War will do it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It ought to hold as against the Government.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman thinks so, I have no objection to inserting the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation." The gentleman will understand that this is located on the site of the present Aqueduct Bridge or near it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have noted with what great care the chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee always insists that bridge bills shall be subject to the general provisions.

Mr. ADAMSON. This is not a private structure; this is a structure put up by the Government with Government means and under the absolute control of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does that mean that when the Government provides the money to build a bridge there is no reason that it should respect the rights of navigation?

Mr. ADAMSON. The general bridge act does not undertake to deal with what the Government does at its own expense.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Since the gentleman is so careful, as chairman of his committee, to protect the rights of navigation with respect to all other bridges, should not the rights of navigation be protected as to this structure?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think they will be without putting in that language, but if the gentleman thinks they will not be, I have no objection to putting in the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is this to be a memorial bridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir; it is simply a replacing of the old Aqueduct Bridge. We want to put all of the money into the bridge.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the gentleman desires to spend the Government money constructing the bridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. Every bit of it into the bridge.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. One other question, Mr. Speaker. In section 5 of this bill I notice that—

> Three hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of securing proper plans and for the payment of any lands, easements, rights, or property, and for the removal of the present structure, and immediately to commence the construction of said bridge and the approaches thereto.

That is a separate and distinct amount from the million dollars appropriated for the erection of the bridge.

Mr. ADAMSON. No part of this goes into the bridge, but we have determined that that amount is too large, and we propose to offer an amendment cutting it in half, making it $150,000. We did not believe that that large sum would be necessary to pay for the approaches, plans, and specifications, and we do not believe that $150,000 will be necessary, but we thought we would be on the safe side.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Then you appropriate $50,000 for the purpose of maintaining and repairing the present structure?

Mr. ADAMSON. That was placed there on the recommendation of the War Department, which estimated the probable cost of repairs until the new bridge could be completed at $49,000. We have made a subsequent investigation, and find that the District itself has made some repairs, and we have concluded that this amount will not be needed for that purpose, and we propose to offer an amendment to cut it in half, making it $25,000.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I was interested in knowing that these sums were going to be reduced from the present amount. Now, one other question. The gentleman from Georgia, of course, knows that the present Aqueduct Bridge, or the control of the piers, has been in charge of the War Department, whereas the roadway at the present time on the present bridge is under the control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. As I understand it, this bill proposes to put the new bridge entirely in the control of the War Department.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; the Aqueduct Bridge is a good deal like the orphan who when he was asked where he was raised said he never was raised; he sorter come up. The present bridge was built on a structure on which the old canal crossed the river. It came under the War Department and then under the District of Columbia, and then it got mixed up and came in sometimes under one and sometimes under the other, neither one giving it attention, until it is about to go down and leave the river without a crossing. The regulation has been divided and the upkeep has been divided, but we saw no reason for allowing it to continue. This is a navigable stream; the bridge is being built under the authority and at the expense of the Government, and we thought the United States should retain control of the bridge in every respect.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. In reply to the statement made by the gentleman I want to call attention to the fact that that part of the bridge which by the report of the War Department is considered unsafe and which necessitates a new bridge is that part which has been under the control of the War Department; that the roadway, so far as the evidence goes, in charge of the Commissioners of the District is not unsafe, and that if there has been any lack of performance of duty on the part of either one of these people having jurisdiction over the bridge it must be by the War Department.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not mean by my remarks to criticize anybody; I was trying to emphasize the idea that the situation ought to be clarified.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I concur with the gentleman that the bridge as a whole ought to be under the control of some one division of the Government and not divided in upkeep between the War Department and the District Commissioners. I am making no quarrel about that. The gentleman stated that the bridge was to be built at the expense of the Government, when by the terms of this bill one-half is to be built by the District of Columbia.

Mr. ADAMSON. We are going to make them pay one-half of the cost, but the Government is going to build it.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I think that is proper—that it should be built under one jurisdiction and not under two. With the understanding, Mr. Speaker, that the appropriation of $300,000 is to be reduced to $150,000, and the $50,000 appropriation to be cut to $25,000, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina reserve his objection?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is rather a long bill, containing some eight sections in the substitute as reported, and has some very nice questions in it. Everybody knows that there has to be something done about the Aqueduct Bridge. If I am compelled to vote for this bill as it stands on a motion to suspend the rules, I shall vote for it, and I think the House will vote that way, but would not it be better to let it come up and be considered in the House rather than to force it to a vote on a motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman that on a very thorough investigation on my part, the matter having been brought to my attention not for the first time at this session of Congress but during the last two sessions, both by the Commissioners of the District and the Engineer Department of the War Department, it is my judgment that there is no question but that an absolute necessity exists for the construction of a new bridge at this point. In other words, the present Aqueduct Bridge is in such condition now that the commissioners have recently, within the last two weeks, issued an order which prevents more than one street car being upon that bridge at a time. They have cut down the weight of the traffic, so that vehicles have had to diminish the load they carry in a great many instances while crossing this bridge. There is actual necessity that some legislation be had looking to construction of a new bridge, and I hope the gentleman will not object, assuring him that I have at heart the expenditure of the money.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman further reserve his objection?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. When in a preceding Congress a similar bill was introduced we referred it to the War Department, and the War Department objected to the Government alone defraying the entire expense of the bridge. The committee visited the premises and we investigated the character of the bridge. We declared it dangerous then. In fact, a storm arose while some of us were on the bridge, and it frightened us, for we thought it was going to blow away, to shake down. We consulted Col. Langfitt, an expert in the War Department, and he made us a tabulated statement of the cost, on which we base this substitution of $1,000,000. He found that we could construct a good bridge there, one that would answer all the purposes, for between $900,000 and $1,000,000.

The War Department very strongly approved of the plan of constructing a bridge, but did not want to have the Government pay all of the money. The State of Virginia did not want to pay any of the money and the District of Columbia did not offer to pay for it. The committee was ready to report the bill in the last Congress if we could have found anyone willing to pay for the bridge. Finally, the District of Columbia agreed to pay half of the amount, and when the District agreed to do that and we became satisfied it could be constructed for $1,000,000, the War Department strongly recommended it be done, the Government paying one-half and the District one-half. I will state to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] that to my certain knowledge, and to the knowledge of those members of the committee who have visited it several times, the construction of the bridge is absolutely necessary. If it be not constructed there will be great inconvenience and great loss of traffic. There are but two bridges now connecting this great city with the southern shore and there is no bridge adequate to answer the purposes and meet the demands of traffic.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I was not addressing myself so much to the gentleman upon the merit of the bridge as upon the question of procedure. It is safer for us, it seems to me, to take this bill up and consider it in Committee of the Whole than it is to be forced to vote upon it sooner or later under a motion to suspend the rules, because I think that with the information that the House would obtain under the 40 minutes of debate, coupled with what it now knows, the House will be led to vote for the bill under suspension of the rules, where it would not have a chance to amend it. I hope the gentleman will give us a chance to consider the bill in such a manner that we can amend it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I note what all of the gentlemen have to say, but there are certain things in this bill that it seems to me should be amended before it goes any further. For instance, the Government proposes to expend $1,150,000 immediately, and one of the conditions of the bill is that the railroad company shall have the absolute right to double-track the bridge, and that in the future any agreement between that railroad company or any other railroad company shall turn this bridge over to them absolutely as they care to use it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, we have agreed upon offering an amendment changing that and leaving it absolutely in the control of the Secretary of War to make all provisions and terms on which any number of railroads may use the bridge.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Of course, I did not know all of that, and that is one of the most serious objections I have to the bill. As it is written now, the Government proposes to construct the bridge and absolutely relinquish the control of it to the railroad companies, who, by agreement, can put as little or as much traffic as they please upon it, and the Secretary of War, or anyone else under the terms of the bill, has no control whatever.

Mr. MANN. That is one of the reasons why I addressed the gentleman on the question of procedure, because, if not objected to, it will come before the House for consideration on each of its provisions, whereas, if a motion to suspend the rules is made, no one can amend the bill; no one can change it. Of course, you can defeat it theoretically, but practically it will carry on a motion to suspend the rules, although there are some things in the bill that ought to be changed. Whether it be correct or not—and I do not know whether it is—I have the impression sufficiently strong to make me believe that the Aqueduct Bridge matter is an emergency, and that if we do not construct something there or do something with this present bridge, it is liable to fall down and cause a disaster sooner or later that will be to the everlasting shame of Congress. That may not be correct, yet I have that impression.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is true.

Mr. MANN. I have had that impression forced upon me so strongly that I would vote for the bill the way it stands under suspension of the rules, although I think we ought to have a chance to amend it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from South Carolina will permit me, I will read the amendment so as to satisfy him.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I do not think that is necessary, Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the chairman of the committee that an amendment will be offered correcting the condition to which I object. Therefore I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that we go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 759, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 759) to provide for the removal of what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in place thereof.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we dispense with the first reading of the bill. The bill has been read already.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, is it desired to have any general debate?

Mr. MANN. I would like to get some information. There was a very interesting conversation going on awhile ago, with the distinguished gentleman from Georgia engaged, as well as the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina and others. We could not hear on our side of the House what was said. I do not know just what the situation is. I have read considerably in the newspapers and heard as to the engineers, but I do not know just what the situation is about this bridge, whether there is a dispute as to where it is to be built or whether it is to ascertain what it can be built for, and all those things.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the gentleman if he could not hear me. I thought I was lifting up my voice, even if I did not weep, so that he could hear me.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will understand sometimes a conversation goes on, and the gentleman a good deal of the time faced the other way to talk to gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to consume much time. I will briefly state, however, that I believe for five or six years the question has been agitated as to the reconstruction of this bridge. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, however, did not take up the matter until during the Sixty-third Congress.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] introduced a bill, and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce immediately began the consideration of the question by a physical examination as well as by hearings and by consideration in the committee. We visited the locality and consulted with Army engineers. We had them make calculations and specifications. It was stated that the bridge could be enlarged and widened and constructed at the present place. The bridge is narrow, the street going out to it is narrow and approaches it at right angles, which makes it inconvenient and sometimes dangerous when traffic becomes congested there, so it was stated that we must either widen the bridge or widen the street at the elbow immediately at the conjunction of the street with the bridge, or we must move this end of the bridge farther east toward Thirty-fourth Street. I think myself it is unnecessary to go that far. I believe the whole situation can be remedied on the present site by widening out that space.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is it then intended that they condemn part of that property for this bridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. It may be necessary if they locate at the present site to condemn a small amount of property. There would be a great deal less to be condemned than by coming farther this way.

Mr. MANN. The canal runs along there, does it not?

Mr. ADAMSON. It runs under the end of the bridge, the northern end of the bridge.

Mr. MANN. It would be swinging this end of the bridge around to the east and running across that little narrow strip?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think that will interfere with the canal if they located the bridge at that point.

Mr. MANN. I do not mean to interfere with the canal, but to swing that end around.

Mr. ADAMSON. I noticed a little brick building at the turn that might perhaps have to be removed. If they did, they would certainly get plenty of room.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The engineer of the War Department having charge of this bridge stated to me that it would be desirable in the construction of a new bridge to have the District of Columbia end several feet lower down the river and the Virginia terminus of the bridge practically where it is, for the purpose of having the bridge go at right angles with the river. At the present time the bridge does not run straight across the flow of the stream. There are certain advantages which the engineers say they gain in having the bridge run at right angles to the stream.

Mr. MANN. What advantage can they get? They can build the abutments at right angles to the stream.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It is the purpose, as I understand it, to bring the Washington end of the bridge a little farther east than the end of the present bridge, not altogether, possibly, for the purpose I have stated, but in order to widen the bridge and make the approach to the same more accessible.

Mr. MANN. To see if I am correct in my recollection. I used to walk over there a good many times——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I ride over it frequently now.

Mr. MANN. Recently I have ridden over it, and there is quite a little difference in that. There are two street car companies who take passengers to go over this bridge, one of them bringing passengers on a level with the bridge and the other taking passengers on a level away above the level of the bridge, where they come down steps. Is that correct?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. As I understand it, one line of cars now goes out to Great Falls, up the river.

Mr. MANN. I mean going toward the bridge.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Going from the District across to Virginia?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Whether it is the same railroad I can not say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Well, the Pennsylvania Avenue car line runs out there.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. They do not cross the bridge.

Mr. MANN. They do not cross the bridge, but they go to the approach on the left of the bridge. The F Street car line——

Mr. ADAMSON. Does not touch it at all.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Goes right to the end of the bridge, except up a stairway 50 or 100 feet, or more?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The F Street line does; yes.

Mr. MANN. That is what I say. Now, they go down those stairways?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes. The passengers do.

Mr. MANN. If you swing the bridge around 200 or 300 feet, that means much more inconvenience for anyone who goes on the F Street car line and wants to go across the bridge.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that, because they can go down the first street that is open, just by side of the present car barn, instead of going down the steps.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they might go down on a sliding board.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. There is a sidewalk and a paved street there.

Mr. MANN. There is a paved street, that was paved at one time with stone blocks, and that does not go clear down, and that has grass and weeds in it, and it is so steep that nobody can go down it. I recall the location very well. I used to ride over there on the street cars, and have walked over, though the last year I have only ridden over in somebody else's machine.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman from Georgia tell us why the State of Virginia should not be required to pay a part of the expense for the construction of this bridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. I give it up. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] takes the floor, possibly he can render an apology for that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Am I to infer from that that the gentleman thinks there is no reason why the State should not contribute?

Mr. ADAMSON. The only reason I know as to why they do not contribute is that they are unwilling to do so.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to say in regard to the street car line, as I remember it the F Street line comes down perpendicularly with the river and turns around an elbow and goes east, where it would be possible for the passengers to come down the steps.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman had allowed me another minute I would have succeeded in explaining, I will say, in answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], the full geography of the situation.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Georgia to clear up the situation.

Mr. ADAMSON. The Traction Co. car goes west and turns into the barn at the northern or Washington end of the bridge. That is, the material difference between the gentleman from North Carolina and myself was that he said it was the District of Columbia end of the bridge and I said it was the northern end. They are identical. The street on which the Traction Co. car runs does not stop, but goes on up north on the District of Columbia side.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. ADAMSON. I have been up that road a hundred times, and I know.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. You speak of the Capital Traction as the green cars?

Mr. ADAMSON. I said the street.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. You do not mean the car track?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not mean the car.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman now has made himself clear. He did not do so before.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman had listened he would have seen the clarification in my remarks at the outset. I said the car turns into the barn, but the street runs on out on the north side of the river. The bridge is not at right angles with the river, but it is substantially at right angles with the street. The bridge, making a short turn, like my elbow, in a southerly direction, makes a short turn in a narrow street, turning into a narrow bridge that causes a tremendous congestion in the traffic. The F Street car line runs up on top of the hill, and it is reached from the level of the bridge by an almost interminable staircase, pretty easy to fall down, but pretty hard to climb up. I do not think that many people who wish to cross the river go up on that road. I think they go on that car line when they want to go up to Cabin John, Glen Echo, and other pleasure resorts on this side of the river. The Washington end of the bridge can be greatly improved, the engineers of the War Department say, by widening it and moving it a little farther east; some of them say as far east as Thirty-fourth Street.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Which is a block.

Mr. ADAMSON. Two blocks. If they should bring it to Thirty-fourth Street, people could get off the F Street line and go down there. Thirty-fifth Street at that point is not used. The F Street car line there goes around an elbow. It goes one way and comes back the other. At Thirty-fifth Street there is no way to get down. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has stated, the street is not kept open. The proposition is either to widen the bridge and move the end of it 50 or 100 feet farther east there, or else land the northern end of the bridge at Thirty-fourth Street, or somewhere near it, leaving the southern end of the bridge where it is.

I was going on to say, when I was interrupted, that my idea is like that of the gentleman from North Carolina—that the widening of the bridge is more important than putting the bridge at right angles with the river. The committee, when we were informed of the dangerous character of that bridge, proceeded to hunt money with which to build a new one.

We could not find it at that time. The District did not want to pay for it. The State of Virginia did not want to pay for it, and the War Deparment said that rather than spend a million dollars for that they would make use of the Highway Bridge, lower down the river; but as time went on, during the vacation, the dangerous character of the bridge became more apparent, and the public clamored more for a new bridge, and the District Commissioners decided that they would be willing to pay half of the construction of the bridge.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the committee made any calculation as to how much more the bridge will cost by reason of its being double-tracked for the accommodation of the street-car company than it would cost if it were not for the street-car tracks?

Mr. ADAMSON. We took that up with the engineers, and the best one, I may say, without disparagement to the other great men in the War Department, Col. Langfitt, prepared a statement on it for our committee, a statement which was convincing, in which he showed that a bridge of this character can be constructed for a little over $900,000.

Mr. MADDEN. The question I asked was how much more the bridge would cost because of the fact that the street-car companies would have double tracks on it than it would cost if there were no tracks?

Mr. ADAMSON. My answer was that the calculations took into consideration these street-car tracks.

Mr. MADDEN. The construction of the bridge must be such, on account of its use by the street cars, as to make it much more costly. My own judgment is that the bridge will cost at least 20 per cent more because of the double-tracking for the street cars than it would cost if there were no street car tracks upon it and without making it any more utilitarian for the public.

Mr. ADAMSON. I know; but our figures are made in view of the street car double-track construction. I have no doubt it would cost 20 per cent less if you did not include that.

Mr. MADDEN. The point I wanted to get at was whether or not the street car companies that will use this bridge ought not to pay 20 per cent of the cost of the bridge. Or does the committee conclude that the one-half cent per passenger to be charged would be equivalent to 20 per cent of the original construction cost?

Mr. ADAMSON. The committee gave consideration to that question and conferred with the members of the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on the District of Columbia and with the War Department, and we concluded that the railroad ought not to be a part owner of this bridge.

Mr. MADDEN. But they would be a part owner, would they not?

Mr. ADAMSON. We concluded that the best way to secure compensation for the use of the bridge by the railroad company was to make them be our tenants.

Mr. MADDEN. The principle, I believe, was established in a former Congress, when I was a member of the subcommittee on the District of Columbia years ago, when we were building the bridge to Anacostia.

The bridge was originally intended to cost about $300,000, as I recollect, but the increase in cost to a very much larger sum was occasioned by the fact that the street car companies were to be allowed to use the bridge. We concluded, then, that the street car companies ought properly to pay for the increased cost on account of their use of the bridge. The railroad companies objected, but we insisted. They finally came to our conclusion that they should participate in the cost, not in the ownership or the regulation but in the cost of construction, because of the fact that the bridge was to be constructed in a large measure for their use.

Mr. ADAMSON. That would only amount to paying the rent in a lump sum.

Mr. MADDEN. They ought to be compelled, in addition to that, to pay rent.

Mr. ADAMSON. You might call it in addition to that, but if not paid as purchase money it would be rent in a lump sum.

Mr. MADDEN. There is another thing that ought to be done, and that is if the State of Virginia is unwilling to pay any part of the cost of this bridge they ought to be compelled by the legislation that is enacted to at least purchase the ground upon which to build the bridge on the Virginia shore.

Mr. ADAMSON. We do not need any ground on that shore.

Mr. MADDEN. You do. You can not build a bridge without reaching Virginia.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. Does not the gentleman know that all the land on that side that would be used for the bridge belongs to the Government already? That end of the bridge is on Government soil.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the State of Virginia ought not to be allowed to act the part of dog in the manger, and be allowed to use the bridge and not pay for it.

Mr. CARLIN. Virginia pays one-half cent for each passenger that goes over. The passengers pay to the company, and the company pays it to the State of Virginia.

Mr. MADDEN. The State of Virginia does not.

Mr. CARLIN. They pay it after the people pay the State.

Mr. MADDEN. The people from all over the United States ride over that bridge more than the people of Virginia, and they are taxed.

Mr. ADAMSON. Perhaps the gentleman from Illinois might suggest a solution of this matter by laying an embargo on that bridge, as to its use on the part of the people of Virginia, until they pay their share.

Mr. MADDEN. The bridge ought not to be built until they have paid their share of it.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I think the gentlemen are pretty hard on the State of Virginia. It is just as essential that the people of Virginia and of Maryland should use that bridge as that we should use it. We ought to see to it that the market produce and food products are brought in here from the surrounding country just as cheaply as possible.

Mr. MADDEN. You can get to Virginia readily without going over this bridge.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. There are other bridges; and the provision, so far as the railroad company is concerned, as to contributing to this bridge, is identical with the provision that prevails in respect to the other bridge, namely the Highway Bridge, where they pay so much per passenger.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When the gentleman was explaining this bill a little while ago I asked him why the usual general bridge act precaution was not incorporated in the bill, and he said the Government itself was building the bridge. The gentleman, however, did not object, as I understand, to an amendment providing that the bridge shall be built under the direction of the War Department, subject to the general bridge act.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think we would want it to be made subject to the provisions of the general bridge act, because it has no relation to Government structures.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why should it not be applicable in the construction of a bridge like this? The Potomac River is navigable and there is a great deal of traffic from vessels coming and going. There is no provision in the bill to protect navigation. There is no limitation upon the discretion of the Secretary of War. I am willing to have the bridge constructed, even at Government expense, although such a proposition coming from any other section of the country would perhaps be rejected instantly. But I should like to ask the gentleman whether he would agree to accept an amendment, to be inserted on page 2, line 24, after the word "constructed," which would provide that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed—

In accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters, approved March 23, 1906—

A bridge across the Potomac, and so forth? That would carry into this bridge bill the same provision that the gentleman, on behalf of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, insists shall be put in every other bridge bill that comes into the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I certainly would decline to support an amendment placing this bridge under the terms of the general bridge act, because those provisions do not fit Government construction at all. The general bridge act is drawn to permit, under the consent of Congress and under the guidance and control of the Secretary of War, the construction of bridges by private capital, and there are a great many conditions prescribed there to protect the interests of navigation. I presume the language which the gentleman has in mind is—at a point suitable to the interests of navigation—

Or he wants to draw language to protect the interests of navigation. I have no objection, except that it is absolutely unnecessary. This is a bill providing that the Government itself, through the War Department, which is the guardian of the interests of navigation, shall construct this bridge, which is to be under the control and for the use of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman would not permit a bill to come from his committee authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River, without having it covered by the provisions of the general bridge act, would he?

Mr. ADAMSON. If we were reporting a bill—which we never expect to do—to authorize the Secretary of War to construct at Government expense a bridge across the Mississippi River, and nobody else was to have any part or parcel in the construction of it, we certainly would not say anything about the general bridge act, because it has no relation to Government structures. If it were necessary to advise the Secretary of War of his duty and to instruct him to protect the interests of navigation in building this bridge, that is the language I would put in it. I would not say anything about the general bridge act.

Mr. SIMS. This bridge is above navigation any way. There is to be no draw in it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield to me a couple of minutes for a brief statement? The gentleman has the time.

Mr. ADAMSON. I intended to yield the floor, but I wanted the author of the bill [Mr. CARLIN] to make an explanation of it. Of course I will yield time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I have occupied the floor a great deal longer than I intended.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose this bridge was built with Government money as proposed and it was found that the spans of the bridge were so low that vessels could not pass under it?

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me answer his question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It may be a fixed bridge.

Mr. CARLIN. Let me explain to the gentleman that this bridge as now located is above navigation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the stream is navigable at this point. The gentleman will not deny that the Potomac River is navigable at the point at which this bridge is to be constructed.

Mr. CARLIN. It is not navigable for such vessels as will be obstructed by a bridge of this sort.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is navigable, and under the general dam law which we hope to get through at some time and in some shape it can be made navigable for hundreds of miles farther up the river without expense to the Government. There has been a great deal of talk about the Great Falls and about power companies and all that, and all in God's world that we need to do is to put through the general dam act, and there will be plenty of private money to develop the power under Government regulation, and to make that river navigable, and it will not cost the Government a cent. I am not willing to admit that it is not a navigable river, as suggested by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN].

Mr. CARLIN. I meant not navigable at present.

Mr. ADAMSON. I call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that these streams with rocky banks and occasional rapids in them that are denounced as not navigable are the very ones that are most easily made navigable without expense to the Government, carrying with that development of navigation the accompanying benefits of the development of power for manufacturing, lighting, and transportation purposes.

Mr. CARLIN. I hope that will be done at some time.

Mr. ADAMSON. That will be done at some time, and if this generation is not wise enough to do it the Lord will raise up a generation that will be wise enough to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman wants to protect the interests of navigation. I have always found him ready to do so.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman overlooks my point. This is our bridge, built under our control and protection, and we do not have to put in the ordinary limitations on private capital, because private capital will not have anything to do with it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly; but why should not the Government set an example to private owners? Why should the Government build a bridge with fixed spans, for instance, that will impede navigation, when the Government requires all private owners to provide for the needs of navigation.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have stated to the gentleman in the clearest language that I am capable of using that if it is necessary to instruct the War Department to protect the interests of navigation, I have no objection to putting into the bill the proper language to do that, and that proper language would be that the Secretary of War shall so construct the bridge as to protect the interests of navigation, not saying anything about the general bridge act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman accept that?

Mr. ADAMSON. I certainly will, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will undertake to draft an amendment to cover that point, because in all sincerity I challenge the gentleman——

Mr. ADAMSON. I have too much affection for my friend to accept any challenge from him. I object to dueling anyway. If I had to fight, I would not take time to exchange papers. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My challenge is neither personal nor political. I love the gentleman too much to propose either, but I challenge the gentleman as a legislator to point out any line in this bill which proposes to protect the interests of navigation.

Mr. ADAMSON. I accept that challenge.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Wherein does the bill protect the interests of navigation?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is assumed that the Secretary of War will do his duty and protect navigation. As an agent of the Government he is intrusted with the duty of taking our money and building a bridge over a navigable stream. I will not assume that he will not do it, but if the gentleman deems it necessary to advise him I am willing to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am sorry to remind the gentleman that one Secretary of War often differs from another Secretary of War, and sometimes one Secretary of War does not remain in place long enough to carry out the plans of the preceding Secretary of War, and sometimes the Secretary of War does not agree with the President of the United States on some of these questions. And if it comes to the point that the Fine Arts Commission should build the bridge, the needs of navigation might suffer.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the gentleman will not put this under the Fine Arts Commission.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We are appropriating a million dollars here for the construction of a bridge, and why not fix special directions as you do in other bills?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman will remember that when we were down at Panama some people accused the Fine Arts Commission of causing the slides in the canal.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question for information. Is the river at this point a navigable stream, or has it been so declared?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think there is any doubt but that the Potomac River is navigable. Some parts may be better than others, but the Government has the right to allow it to be all made navigable, and there may be stretches above these rapids that people do actually navigate now. I do not know about that.

Mr. CARLIN. If the gentleman will yield, I will give him some information about that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am going to yield soon to the gentleman so that he can give volumes of information.

Mr. SIMS. There would not be a canal there if it was navigable.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. How much Federal property do we own beyond the river, and would it be sufficient so that we could ignore entirely the interests of Virginia and vote for our own interests?

Mr. ADAMSON. You might build a fence on the other side to keep Virginia from coming across.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman does not catch my idea. Is the bridge so necessary for the General Government that we could afford to build that anywhere without regard to Virginia?

Mr. ADAMSON. The Secretary of War declined to pay the entire expense, because he said the use of the War Department would not justify it; that it was not sufficient, but the Government would pay half. We have over there Fort Myer and the cemetery at Arlington and the demonstration farm; we have considerable property there.

Mr. FESS. It does not compel a Member of Congress to vote for this proposition on the question of Virginia's rights?

Mr. ADAMSON. If we can only get the bridge authorized, I consider it a triumph.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The bill appropriates $300,000 for the purpose of securing plans, for the payment of land, and for the removal of the present structure, and then section 8 appropriates $50,000 for the purpose of maintaining and repairing the present structure until the new bridge is completed. I would like to ask an explanation of some of the inconsistencies in these two provisions.

Mr. ADAMSON. What is that? I have not noticed any inconsistency.

Mr. LENROOT. Section 3 authorizes the Secretary of War to make a contract for the removal of the present bridge and the sale thereof.

Mr. ADAMSON. It does not say that he shall do that before he commences the new bridge.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, section 5 appropriates $300,000 for the plans and removal of the present structure, while in section 8 $50,000 is appropriated to repair and maintain the present structure.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman was not in the Hall in the early consideration of the bill. We know that it is necessary to make plans and surveys and possibly to acquire some property. We placed in the bill $300,000 in accordance with outside suggestions, but after further deliberation we concluded that that sum was entirely unnecessary, and we shall offer an amendment reducing it to $150,000. If we find that it is not necessary, it will not be expended.

Mr. LENROOT. What was the necessity of providing for the removal of the structure at this time?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the way the bill was drawn; but we considered it was not necessary to remove it, and we have cut the amount, or propose to cut the amount, believing that $150,000 will cover the preliminary expense and examination and plans and specifications and the possible acquisition of the property.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman thinks that that should be stricken out of section 5?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is not necessary to strike it out. I do not know what shape it will take; the plan may involve an immediate removal of it; I do not know.

Mr. ESCH. If the gentleman will pardon me, the bridge that is to be constructed may not be in alignment with the bridge now existing. If it is not, some of the piers in the existing bridge will have to be repaired, and very likely if the new bridge requires a year and a half or two years for construction it is necessary to provide funds to repair the existing bridge pending the construction of the new bridge.

Mr. LENROOT. By section 4 the Secretary of War is authorized to employ the services of such engineers and other persons as he shall determine to be necessary to carry out the provisions in this act. Is there any reason why the Army engineers should not supervise the doing of the work which the Government is constructing?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the Secretary of War does not find it necessary to employ outside engineers, he will not do it.

Mr. LENROOT. But here is the authorization for it. Is there any reason the gentleman can think of why it should not be constructed by Army engineers?

Mr. ADAMSON. Sometimes they are all busy. The gentleman knows that we are all now in a great state of agitation as to preparedness.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think that, if this remains in the bill, outside engineers will be employed when Army engineers will not be employed?

Mr. ADAMSON. I take it that no more additional expense will be incurred than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I understood in a colloquy that the gentleman had early in the debate that it was the purpose to put the District end of the bridge a little lower down the river, and I was wondering whether in doing that any consideration was given to a change of the angle of the bridge.

As I recall it now—and I was over the bridge recently—there is a very abrupt turn, and I was wondering whether the engineers would take into consideration the changing of that turn so as to make it a little less abrupt than it is now.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I undertook to explain, in the outset of my remarks, that the bill contemplates the possibility of that, and we leave it to the discretion of the War Department as to whether they shall change that angle. It has been thought desirable to place the bridge more nearly at right angles with the current, if it can be done economically; but the committee thinks it more important to widen the bridge and relieve the congestion at the end of the bridge in that way than it is to secure a right angle with the current of the river.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I agree to that, but it does seem to me that some way ought to be found to lengthen the curve in such a way as to make it less abrupt. It is dangerous as it is now.

Mr. ADAMSON. That will be done. We will relieve that so as to relieve that congestion.

If no one else imagines that I can give him any information, I yield a few minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] for the purpose of answering questions, for he is surcharged with information.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I think I know when the time has arrived for action and not for speaking. I realize that this House is now in a humor to pass this long-needed legislation. I think that we all agree that the necessity for this bridge exists, otherwise we would not to-day be asked to consider it. As to the question of how the Government is to be compensated by the railroads who may use the bridge, I confidently believe that this is one investment that will prove to be profitable to the Government. The electric railway now using the Highway Bridge pays to the Government about $12,500 a year, or, based upon a 4 per cent investment, in excess of one-third of the entire cost of the bridge. Using that as a basis for the present estimate, it would mean that the railway company now using this bridge would be paying for about 33 to 35 per cent of the cost of the bridge, and yet owning nothing except the right to use it. If the travel were increased so that the burden upon the bridge were thereby increased the revenue to the Government would necessarily increase, and I believe that on a 4 per cent basis you will find that the people who use the bridge and actually travel upon it will have paid about 50 per cent of the cost of the structure. It is one of the few investments that the Government can make, in my judgment, in bridge building that will turn out to be a revenue producer.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is not the gentleman prepared to give us the figures as to the number of people who cross the bridge on the street cars?

Mr. CARLIN. I said that, based on an estimate of travel for the railroad now upon the Highway Bridge, and upon the same percentage of payment, it would amount to $12,500 a year to the Government; or, upon a 4 per cent basis, an investment of about $350,000, which is over one-third of the cost of the bridge.
